NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor of THE INQUIRER wishes all his readers a Happy New Year. There are many signs of disquiet and causes for anxiety if we choose to dwell upon them. But the brave man who deserves happiness, and will find it, looks out into the future with unconquerable hope. He is not blind to the difficulties; he is conscious of his own weakness, and is deeply troubled by the sin and the miseries of the world. But he has a confidence in God which gives him strength. The year in front will certainly bring with it conflicts for all of us. It will make an immense difference to our success whether we fight as happy or unhappy warriors; whether we believe that we can play—

“In the many games of life that one or whether we fight without confidence and joy, feeling that all is doubtful and uncertain. The happiness of the New Year depends far more on the spirit in which we enter into it and live through it than on the events which will occur. It is this spirit of quiet, firm hope in the future which the Editor wishes to all his readers.

Where what we most do value must be won,”

MR. LLOYD GEORGE, in a non-party address to a gathering of clergy and ministers in Wales last week spoke some wise, strong words. “The great lesson of Christianity,” he said, “is that you cannot redeem those who are below except by the sacrifice of those who are above. You cannot touch any evil in this country without finding there are interests that have struck their roots deep into it, and are flourishing even upon its very putrescence. I have seen gallant men beaten back by the biting blast they met along the path of progress.” His first sentence does indeed express a vital principle of Christianity. It is the principle which lies within the doctrine of the Atonement, that the world can only be redeemed by the sacrifice and suffering of the better on behalf of the worse. When that is forgotten or ignored we are left with the doctrine of Nietzsche, that pity and sacrifice are absurd, and that the strong man should stride on towards supermanhood unheeding over the bodies and souls of the weak and wretched.

In another part of his speech Mr. Lloyd George again emphasised this point. It was not the function of the churches, he said, to engage in party brawls, nor to advocate any specific measures. Their function “is to create an atmosphere in which the rulers of this country, whether in the Legislature or in the municipalities not only can engage in reforming these dire evils, but in which it will be impossible for them not to do so.” This must be done “first by rousing the national conscience to a knowledge of the existence of these evils, and afterwards to a sense of its responsibilities for dealing with them. And the second way is by inculcating the necessary spirit of self-sacrifice, without which it is impossible for any nation to deal with gigantic problems of this kind.” A passionate desire for social justice characterised the speech throughout, and the presence of two bishops on the platform, and people of all shades of religious and political opinion among the audience, was a satisfactory indication of the growing spirit of friendliness and co-operation between men and women belonging to different schools of thought, which is one of the finest results, so far, of the awakening of the national conscience.

WE offer our hearty congratulations to Professor Henry Jones, now Sir Henry Jones, on the occasion of the New Year's honour of knighthood which has been conferred upon him. He is widely known and admired as an inspiring philosophical teacher and thinker. In his own University of Glasgow he has long been a great intellectual and moral force. He has been Hibbert Lecturer on Philosophy at Manchester College, Oxford, during the last five years, where he has found time to deliver courses of lectures through two terms of each session. Glasgow and Oxford will rejoice in the deserved honour paid to so vigorous and attractive a character. We are glad also that Philosophy, which, in the hands of a great teacher, is surely a most important moral as well as intellectual force, should be regarded by the King and his Government as worthy of such a mark of distinction.

* * *

SIR GEORGE ASKWITH, who has been so successful in settling trade disputes, is at present in Manchester trying to bring about a conference on the subjects which have led to the recent lamentable cotton lock-out. We do not attempt to judge whether masters or men are most to blame. We have sufficient confidence in the sober common sense of English employers and employed to believe that if representatives can be gathered round a table, and can be made to understand each other's point of view, some agreement will be reached. These commercial civil wars are disastrous not only to those engaged in them, but to tens of thousands of non-combatants as well. We earnestly hope that Sir George Askwith will succeed in his great mission of peace.

* * *

DR. SUN-YAT-SEN, who has been elected President of the Republic of China by the Nanking Assembly, offers a striking instance of the way in which Western thought and methods of political reform are influencing the leading men of the East. For twenty years, interrupted for a brief space in 1901, Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen has been an exile from his country, and has carried on his studies chiefly in America and Japan. His "Solution of the Chinese Question," however, has been widely read in China, and so dangerous was his influence felt to be by the Government that a price of £100,000 was fixed upon his head. But the fear of death does not exist for the ardent patriot, and Sun-Yat-Sen has always told his friends that it would not matter in the least if he had to forfeit his life. There were thousands of others, he said, ready and fit to take his place—a remark of special significance in view of the fact that it was thought by the majority of people, even up to a quite recent date, that China was still wrapped in a slumber from which no hint of the triumph of progress in other lands would arouse her for a very long time.

THE recent controversy between the President and ex-President of the United States in regard to the Arbitration Treaties did not, happily, spoil the harmony which prevailed at the Peace Banquet in New York last Saturday. In touching upon Mr. Roosevelt's strictures in the course of his speech, Mr. Taft pointed out that if questions of national honour were to be ruled out when matters for arbitration were under discussion, the very provocation would be omitted that was most likely to lead to war. "We have been told," he said, "that to arbitrate matters of vital interest is absurd, because we should not abide by the judgment of the Court. If we are not willing sometimes to be beaten at court, we had better not enter it at all." It had often been said, he added, in depreciation of Mr. Gladstone that he consented to arbitration and submitted to defeat, but to-day there was nothing in the memory of Gladstone that gave him a greater reputation than this fact.

* * *

THE committee appointed to administer Mr. Carnegie's £2,000,000 peace fund have determined to proceed along three main lines of advance and endeavour:—propaganda and education, international law, economics and history. The first section will give scope for unlimited activity and useful work on the part of those who are already publicly advocating the cause of peace, and will place the movement, by means of the international bureau to be established in Paris, on a firmer basis than it has ever had before. The bureau will be under the general direction of a consultative committee, consisting of forty eminent public men drawn from England, Hungary, Belgium, France, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Japan. Baron d'Estournelles de Constant will be the president of this committee, which includes M. Prudhommeaux, (who will act as European secretary); Professor Charles Richet; the Baroness von Suttner, authoress of "Lay down Your Arms"; Count Okuma, president of the Japan Peace Society; Lord Morley, Lord Courtney, Lord Weardale, and Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald.

* * *

ALTHOUGH the names of Professor Gilbert Murray, Mr. William Archer, Sir William Ramsay, and other distinguished men are associated with the Simplified Spelling Society, we cannot help sharing the prejudice which exists in the minds of those who think that "haist" looks uglier than "haste," and "mien" and "dien" more foreign and eccentric than "mine" and "dine." Simplification is needed in too many directions for us to be against any reasonable method of lessening the complexities of life, but we are not sure that in this particular case the cure is not worse than the disease. Quite apart from the fact that it is an affront to all our æsthetic instincts to see the English language treated in this arbitrary way, nothing seems to be gained even from the point of view of the child, in whose interests it would certainly be desirable to make spelling easier. In the word "simplified," for instance, the letter "e" is still retained for no particular reason that we can see, while it is added to the first syllable of "society" (soeciety) for no obvious purpose. It may be true that "those accustomed to reading the Bible," and other great books, would revere their teaching and appreciate their literary qualities no less with the new spelling than we do at present. But let us not do violence too suddenly to the subtle laws of memory and association which link the very look of a word to the thought or fact which it symbolises.

* * *

WE are glad that the recent objections of the Daily News to the "Jingo" sentiments expressed so forcibly in a song sung in the Drury Lane Pantomime have caused the authors of the lines in question to revise them considerably. To many people, judging by certain comments which have appeared in the press, this evidently seems a trifling matter, and one which only fussy people with a morbid dread of militarism would trouble about. But when it is remembered how many thousands of people go to the pantomime, the music-halls, and theatres, where the habit of bringing in topical and political allusions is most in vogue, it is obvious that the way in which these subjects are treated must have a great deal to do with the shaping of that public opinion which we often condemn for its want of enlightenment and impartiality. The theatre may exist for many purposes, according to the view we take of art and life, but the propagation of political ideas tinged with party bias should not be one of them. In any case, allusions made in public performances to the international situation which tend to develop a feeling of hostility between rival nations, will be deprecated by all thinking people at the present time.

THE RELIGION OF THE SPIRIT.

IT is of great importance at the present juncture in religious thought and life that a book of such significance as Professor EUCKEN's "Truth of Religion" should be widely read and studied, and we welcome its appearance accordingly in an English dress. With great cogency and fervour EUCKEN pleads for a new religious synthesis. He shows at length, and in an unanswerable way, that the "existential forms" of mediæval and current religion can no longer give expression to its "substance," wherefore religion itself is loosening its hold on the minds of educated people, with the result that their lives tend to lose all high seriousness and to become more and more superficial, without depth either of thought or feeling. Our lives are wanting in unity and dignity, are at the mercy of externalities, with no anchorage in eternal verities. "Things are in the saddle and ride mankind." Man seems farther than ever from being master of his life.

Far from being discouraged by this chaos in thought and aimlessness in life, EUCKEN finds it the natural result of the spiritual crisis through which we are passing, and foresees the approach of a great spiritual awakening through the inflowing of new energy, which will raise man to a higher level of existence by the deepening of his inner life. He believes in a spiritual evolution which signifies

"That the attainment of the higher stages becomes possible only after having passed through the lower stages; that in each stage the whole brings forth a new beginning, and, consequently, all movement has the foundation of a timeless order. . . . there is a growth in the depth of reality as well as in the living presence of a higher order."

As evolution on this earth has proceeded from the inorganic to the organic, from the unconscious to the conscious, and from the conscious to the self-conscious, so there is slowly evolving in man a still higher stage—the "Spiritual Life," which, based on the animal life of the body and the self-centred psychical consciousness, transcends their needs, impulses, and desires, and uses them as means and materials for its own eternally valid and self-sufficing ends. Civilisation and culture, science, art, and literature are all creations of this Spiritual Life, which in all these departments strives to rise above the indifferent and fleeting flux of sensation and desire, to give "duration to the moment," and to build up a lasting structure of Truth or Beauty. In them the creative spirit of man is evolving a spiritual world which has an absolute value of its own.

* The Truth of Religion. By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D. Williams & Norgate. Pp. 622. 12s. 6d. net.

From the point of view of current scientific evolutionism all truths, all creations of beauty, all heroic deeds are of value only as a means to the preservation of the life of individuals or groups, and have no intrinsic value as ends in themselves. From the standpoint of the Spiritual Life such things are of eternal value. Life exists to realise them and has value itself only so far as it succeeds in doing this. EUCKEN points out this significance of culture, science, and art, but insists that something more is needed both to raise them to their highest level, and to gather them into the unity of a profound and all-pervading spiritual whole. This something more is religion, the deepening and raising of life which comes from the intuition that human life, insignificant or meaningless as it may seem to a superficial view, is conscious of its participation in an infinite Whole. This consciousness raises man above mere external nature and his own psychical subjectivity. He feels himself part and organ of a Divine Life. He is no longer inspired by mere sensual gratification, or the desire for power or fame, but by ideals whose worth and beauty have eternal value because they spring from the Superpersonal Life of the Whole.

"Religion comprehends reality as a development or expression of a total-life, but it makes a great difference whether such a total-life appears as effective in the concatenation of the whole and as mediated through this to the individual parts, or whether it appears as immediately present in the part, and as directly related to the part. The former view predominates in Universal religion and the latter in Characteristic religion. The development of the immediate presence of the Whole places the individual in possession of a new light as an expression of infinity—as the point where an original and self-subsisting life bursts forth."

When once that "new light" has shone within a man, he feels himself the denizen of a new world which exists eternally in the Whole, but which he has to recreate and embody by strenuous effort in the phenomenal world in which his action is effective.

The New Life thus shows itself, not as the easy-going acceptance of a truer point of view, or a passive acquiescence in a higher order, but as the creation of a Spiritual World by ever-renewed struggle and toilsome effort. As the beauty of the flower arises from the appropriation and transformation of the coarser elements of the soil, so the Spiritual Life feeds upon, and transforms and glorifies the sentient and psychic life.

"Out of the mould the rose unfolds,
The soul, through blood and tears."

EUCKEN finds that Christianity, "as to its substance," is the highest embodiment of religion, because it takes up the experiences and the opposites of life in their widest extent and fastens them together into a Whole; it is great in strivings, struggles and transformations; it appears before all else as a powerful current of life . . . an awakening of immediate and intimate life, a vivid representation and realisation of an Eternal Order which all the changes of Time cannot destroy, but, on the other hand, a fundamental revision of its traditional existential form has become absolutely necessary.

Very fundamental is the revision of Christianity he requires. It would no longer be based on historical facts, for, as EUCKEN well says,

"Faith has as its object what is of timeless nature. If an historical fact is put in the place of an object of faith, faith is externalised and reduces religion to a level which has been passed by the most important religions of the world."

It would no longer rest on miracles, not even that of the Resurrection, nor on an external revelation, or the Deity of CHRIST. It would not denounce knowledge or culture, and it would no longer be ascetic. The spiritual would not, as Tolstoy declared, "reject all the demands of the animal in man," rather would religion form the culmination or, better, the organising soul of the whole life of the Spirit; it would be the resolute living in the Whole, the Good and the Beautiful. In weighty words, EUCKEN declares that "Religion must never consider itself as an isolated province but as the characteristic depth of the totality of life." It will "constantly attempt to build up and hold forth a Whole of the Spiritual Life within the human domain over against the immense hindrances and perversions of an indifferent and hostile world."

It is true that the religion conceived by EUCKEN preserves the "substance" of Christianity and is continuous with it, but its continuity is the continuity of the plant and the seed from which it sprang; it is the Religion of the Spirit. It would rise above the pietistic religion which looks to God to further the happiness and well-being of the individual. It must even do more than redeem the individual soul. It must lift humanity to a higher life. EUCKEN feels "that throughout genuine Christianity everywhere there is operative a yearning after a new man, after a new kingdom of peace and love." The Religion of the Spirit will take up and carry forward the task of founding the Kingdom of God.

The chief blemish in EUCKEN's most suggestive and inspiring work is the failure to link on the Spiritual Life which he expounds to the movements for social reform and for justice and righteousness in the sphere of economics and politics. It is not true that "Religion is never mixed in a Yea or a Nay with political and social problems" or "has nothing whatever to do as to whether monarchy or republic, individualistic or socialistic presentation of economic relation is the better condition of things." Christianity has always demanded that the kingdoms of this world should become the kingdoms of our LORD and of his CHRIST. The Religion of the Spirit must be even more zealous for such a consummation. The Spiritual Life will find its realisation not only in the inner world and the domain of science and culture, but in the transformation of economic and social relations. It can never rest till it has embodied its ideal of justice and brotherhood in the whole organisation of the State.

THE SPIRIT AND THE BRIDE.

No longer shall my thoughts hold tyrant sway

Over the rich warm verities of God,
Admitting them or turning them away
With haughty welcome or forbidding nod.

'Tis not in thought to find a sweeter scent
Than that which floats upon me from the rose;

Nor can the mind in its own firmament
Give joy more pure than from the starlight flows.

The whisper of the silver-shining leaves,
The silence of the sleep-enchanted vale,

The movement of the wind among the sheaves—

The majesty of music in the gale—

All in themselves have richer, fuller charms
Than thought can give in putting them aside;

The flesh and blood of earth are as the bride
Of my blest spirit held within mine arms.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN CHURCH AND STATE IN PRUSSIA.

THE present work by Dr. Foerster,* the historian of the Prussian Church, is an outline of a new law elaborated into detail in 142 clauses, which he puts forward as a basis of discussion, in view of the necessity becoming ever more widely felt of altering the present relation of Church to State in Prussia.

Ever since 1905, when the law of separation between Church and State was passed in France, a similar policy has been winning adherents in Germany, and is now beginning to be seriously espoused and promoted. It is certain that the existing laws defining the relations of Church and State are being acutely felt as an anomaly and anachronism among the people themselves, while their intricacy and complexity make their administration by experts as devious and difficult as foreign diplomacy. The time has come to formulate definite concrete proposals by which the State in the future should be guided in its dealings with the religion of the community.

* Entwurf eines Gesetzes betreffend die Religionsfreiheit im Preussischen Staate. Von D. Erich Foerster. Tübingen: Mohr. 1911. 66 pp.

The chief fact to be taken into account to-day is that that community is no longer homogeneous. Apart from Jews and Catholics, Protestantism itself is now broken up into parties and sects, whose divisions are becoming so wide that the unity imposed upon them by the present State legislation is a purely fallacious one.

The Liberals cannot rest under a confession thrust upon them by the secular authority, and yet outside the sphere of that authority they have nowhere to go but the desert, while the Church they leave behind would reclaim all the prestige and emolument of a national institution without being national. On the other hand, among the evangelical conservatives, there are many who are convinced that the rule of the State is detrimental to purely religious activity and strength. Now it is impossible, Dr. Foerster holds, to unite Protestantism in Germany by any formula or standard. The latter would have to be either so empty of content as to omit all real religious potencies, or so purely formal as to conceal, without removing, underlying differences in modes of thought and feeling. The policy of imposing theological uniformity from above is an impossible one. Nor would it be easy for the present State Church to become a Congregational Church. The only solution is to recognise the call for independent religious bodies whose members are united to each other by living religious ties of sympathy, and to break with the existing system of State rule and maintenance.

Voluntaryism, Equality before the State, and Freedom are the three great principles underlying Dr. Foerster's suggested legislation. And for their realisation legislation will be necessary. At present many public offices are closed to those who leave the Church, and an attempt is being made to bring pressure to bear on those who disbelieve in it to have their children instructed in the State religion, and to make such instruction a condition of entrance into the higher schools (höher Schulen). But, apart from that, "freedom to form new religious societies is not given in Prussia; recognition of such is given only by indulgence of a law in each particular case, and it has not always been granted to new religious movements."

What is wanted is (1) that the State grant freedom for the formation of religious communities, which will be true Churches in the sense that they will be based on real unity of spirit and thought among the members; (2) that it give no subventions and privileges to any particular communities, but protect and embody all without distinction; (3) that it secure to all citizens their civil rights independently of their religious creed and against the encroachments of religious corporations; (4) that the cost of maintenance of all religious institutions and machinery be borne by those exclusively on whose behalf they exist.

If legislation embodying these principles were carried out it would deal a blow at the Prussian Church that would reverberate throughout Germany for many years, and make religion there quiver with the shock, but we believe that it would be to the ultimate good of religion and Church alike all over the land. When it has to depend on its own inner spiritual appeal, that appeal will become more real and more powerful, while freedom and spontaneity will conduce to a richness and variety, the loss of which only impoverishes and weakens the whole religious consciousness and experience of a people.

THE MEANING AND PURPOSE OF THE ADULT SCHOOL MOVEMENT.

It is surprising how little is generally known of the Adult School Movement. This is in a large measure due to the quiet and unobtrusive manner in which adult schools have been conducted. Much of the most effective work with which the movement may be credited has been carried out in the spirit of the Quakers who initiated the work, a spirit which finds expression in many of our ideas and methods to-day.

Many feel, however, that our influence would be increased in a remarkable degree if the methods common to most agencies aiming at social reform through progressive thought were adopted. The remarkable progress of the women's movement, and of the Independent Labour Party, is quoted over and over again as an argument for a persistent effort to keep the claims of the schools before the public, and for a strenuous campaign upon modern lines. On the other hand, we are reminded that the strength of our success in the past has been through personal influence, and that if we can thoroughly inspire and help the comparatively few, we shall, through that comparatively few, be of greater service to the many than by resorting to ways and means less thought-provoking than those now adopted.

To understand the Adult School Movement to-day, it is necessary to emphasise its unique character as an educational force in the fullest sense of that term, to examine its own particular message, to find out its relationship to social reform movements and to modern religious thought, and to discover its attitude towards political and civic action.

From the commencement the work has been educational. In teaching unlettered mechanics and labourers to read and write at an early hour on Sunday mornings, the pioneers builded better than they knew. Out of their simple effort has grown a body comprising 1,929 schools, with an approximate membership of 110,686 men and women. Around most of these schools is to be found a network of useful agencies including allotments, social institutes, fireside conferences, and co-operative holidays. We do not teach folk pot-hooks and hangers, or their alphabet from the Bible to-day, but the central idea that moved the original workers is still with us. One can picture the early critics trying to rebuff those enthusiasts by suggesting the absolute futility of their work. Those whom they drew together were not worth educating! The labour expended would never be repaid! This argument is still familiar. It dies hard. Your snobbish critic who prides himself upon his wealth of knowledge often abuses those who have been denied his opportunities for their ignorance, and at the same time uses his influence to keep them ignorant.

But the Quakers believed in the spiritual nature and possibilities in every man and all men. They felt that every individual possessed latent divinity, sleeping power, undeveloped worth. It was this that called forth their best endeavours and loftiest enthusiasm. It is this which is the motive force of our movement to-day. It is felt in some degree in all our schools. Without it no school can exist, and where it is experienced with any intensity is found life, and vigour, and a glowing and continued enthusiasm. The very methods of an adult school suggest the thought that each human soul possesses within him the germ of untold good. The fact is recognised that every man and woman has a personal contribution to make to the experience and thought of the race; that each counts and must not be ignored, and that only in co-operative thought, and study, and service can true and lasting progress be effected.

This, then, is the definite message of adult schools. Above all, we aim at developing men and women. We want to tell every human soul he is more than a machine, an official or "hand," a slave or partisan; that he has a vital place in the scheme of things, a part to play, a work to do, and a destiny to fulfil which is his own. This London of ours, and all our great centres of industry, to-day have a tendency to crush the soul out of man. It is our high duty, in place of such apparently invincible forces, to assert the rights of the individual, the dignity of manhood, the spirituality of human nature. We want every man to feel his feet as a son of God in this life. We want to put him upon an equal footing with his fellow. We want to make him enthusiastic for development in every part of his nature. Without this desire for self-development and self-expression there can be no truly effective social reform. We need to emphasise that humanity can only develop through men, and that men cannot truly develop at the expense of each other. True education is the development of the whole man in order that he may contribute his best to the common stock.

Education with such an object is being carried on in adult schools, and one wonders, in view of this fact, that the question is put to us, What is the definite work and message of this movement? Our definite work is to develop men and women. Our definite message is our belief in the worth of human personalities.

Now, what is actually being done to justify our claim as a discoverer of men, a bringer together into close relationship of those who would otherwise never know each other's views and opinions, difficulties and enthusiasms? In answer, we claim that there is no other organisation either in religious, political or educational circles that possesses such a broad platform. In our schools up and down the country are to be found representatives of every class in society and every type of thought. People of advanced and original thought are welcome, not merely tolerated, and the same may be said with equal truth of the most conservative. They forget artificial barriers and meet simply as men. Such familiar contact means education. It makes for friendship and larger life.

Again, our aim is to investigate all questions upon their own merits. Through a strong determination to ally itself with no particular party, the Adult School Movement has done a great service to public life. The great pity is that those to whom such opportunity would be an inestimable boon do not avail themselves of it. Our civic life would be ennobled and purified if public representatives were to meet around a common table as friends and not opponents, and deal with difficulties as men and women, and not as wire-pullers or party puppets. Something approaching the reunion of Christendom would follow such a systematic neighbourly conference in which representatives of all the churches took part, forgetting their labels and differences, and seeking unity without uniformity. For obvious reasons, such a broad and human platform does not attract many such; but in spite of this, the movement is a strong factor in humanising both political and religious life. Men are not taught to read, and write, and speak, in the elementary sense, but they are encouraged to read the best thoughts of the best writers, to think for themselves, and to express their thoughts in writing and in speech. Able to do this, armed with the human experience facts of the problems before them, numbers of our members have made their way into public life, and through the instrumentality of one or another of the great social and political movements, have expressed what they have felt to be true on such matters.

The grouping of the schools into local federations and county unions has been followed by the launching of educational schemes of a thorough-going type. A visit to Scalby, Uffculme, Woodbrooke, Fircroft, or any other of the centres where holiday is combined with study, is an illuminating explanation of the motto cherished by so many of our folk, "Education through Fellowship."

In testing all things by human experience we find ourselves in line with modern tendencies in all the Churches. Men are testing what they hear on Sundays by what they see during the week. Teaching which does not conform with the facts of life is questioned. What we are concerned about are the realities of human experience, the joys and travails of the human soul. We believe in God working through men, and echo the words of Walt Whitman:

"As I stand aloof and look, there is to me something profoundly affecting in large masses of men following the lead of those who do not believe in men."

C. E. H. CARRINGTON.

BYWAYS.

"THROUGH severe personal examination of my own ways and the ways of strangers, in life and art, I often found that that which one rightly calls a false ideal, was for the particular individual an absolutely necessary if indirect way of reaching his goal. Every return from error is a mighty means of educating mankind as a whole and as an unit, so that one can understand why, to the Searcher of all hearts, a repentant sinner is dearer than the ninety and nine righteous ones. Yes, men often strive for a seemingly false end just as the ferryman works against the stream because it is his desire to reach the opposite shore." Thus wrote Goethe in one of his letters to a friend, and perhaps here lies the explanation of the actions of others which we are so apt to condemn when the motive which prompted the action is misunderstood or hidden from us. We look at the crookedness of the path and forget it may eventually lead up and on to the mountain top.

The uneventful high road is what all can understand; it is so plain, so self-evident, that we marvel or are distressed according to our several natures when we observe those who, impelled by some inward drang, strive to reach their end by devious ways. We cry, "It is wrong," in stentorian tones. We admit of no excuses. We shout ourselves hoarse: "This and this only is the way; walk ye in it." Or we shrug our shoulders in indifference with a self-superior smile of commiseration. We declare the goat-track on the mountain of Life leads to ultimate destruction, if, indeed, it leads anywhere. Why court the dangers of the roaring torrent and the deep abyss when one can follow the old road with its many sign-posts? Why seek possible destruction by wilfully leaving the beaten track when the old way is so safe? Surely it is a very madness of wilfulness and irresponsibility to clamber over rocks and stones for the sake of receiving many a cut and bruise by stumbling along in the dark. What sensible person cares that there are strange sweet flowers to be gathered in these dark places; that the bleached bones of those who have passed the same hazardous way beckon those others on? Let such scorers of the high-ways be taboo—they have stepped aside. Contumely be their portion in this life. They are pariahs, outcasts; leave them to the fate they have chosen for themselves. We cavil at their ways, their speech, in short at everything in which they differ from our, too often, smug selves. We do not understand that thus, and in no other way, can they give adequate expression to that faith which impels them to embark on their perilous journey. Many, indeed, fall into the blackness of the pit, there to lie long years in lonely agony until strength to climb painfully and slowly upwards is given them. Yet those years have not been wasted; they have gathered the sweet flower of Compassion in their fall, and sad, indeed, must be their plight if they ever condemn those who slip where they themselves have fallen. They know too well how smooth was the descent, how treacherous the path, and are more like to give a friendly warning than shrug the shoulders in self-righteous scorn.

Those goat-tracks have, perchance, afforded vast sight of widespread country, and other paths than theirs, which yet lead to the same great goal. They perceive they are not the only ones to climb and stumble and fall in their effort to reach upwards. They learn that amid the many who fall the desire of all, however ill-expressed, is upwards. The action is often halting and wayward, resulting in many a stumble, but the divine trend behind all the seeming futility is the trend upwards and onwards. As rivers rising from different sources run crooked or straight to the ocean, so all efforts, all true beliefs run crooked or straight to the Eternal Ocean of existence, knowledge, bliss and love.

Not in vain have the byways of life been trodden, not in vain have the depths been plumbed; and is it not written of the great Elder Brother that he, too, "descended into hell; and the third day he rose again and ascended into heaven; and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father"? Who will dare say he would condemn those who have fallen in the darkness, since he himself deemed it necessary to descend into hell ere he rose to become one with the Eternal Mind in the clear light of heaven?

M. RANDS.

WINTER JASMINE.

It formed an arch over the low doorway into the neat, whitewashed cottage, with its thatch of brown straw which the tits and sparrows rifle in perfect security and freedom from fear. Everything about the cottage betokened cleanliness, neatness, simplicity, homeliness, peace. If one had walked, as the writer had done that day, over the hill from whose summit, immersed in a stratum of crystal air, could be seen the valleys in blue mist below, and then had traversed the moor, one would have felt that this cottage offered fit symbol for the goal of life's journey; so unpretentious, so suggestive of an old order gone by, yet so animate with living influences, so chastely conspicuous in the light of the setting sun. One may sit within the chimney ingale and look up at night to the stars through the charred tube that touches the sky, and hear the cricket sing, and the old grandfather's clock beat out in measured ticks the slow passing of the moments as they flit by; one may sit in company and be silent all, sharing something deeper than thought, even the brooding melancholy of the sacred night, or the long-reaching rapturous quiet of the evening that has alighted with heavy wings upon the moorland and the curtained hills.

But we did not enter to-day, for the sun had not set, and the weather was extraordinarily mild. Though it was the winter solstice, the beams of the sun had been brilliant for the season, and it was good to be awake and abroad in God's green world. Many an unexpected blossom had been discovered in field and hedgerow—buttercup, dandelion and daisy; cat's eye and red dead nettle; potentilla and hawkweed; yarrow and red campion; and in the village gardens one had had a sniff of wallflowers and winter-violets, and seen clean clusters of the scentless Christmas roses (Japanese Anemone) with a few belated rosebuds, honesty, and pinks. But they had not prepared the eyes for the vision of the bower of yellow jessamine over Dame Mallen's cot. The plant's first parent, brought many years ago to this country from the land of the Rising Sun, has been the means of sending shafts of washed gold through the grey of many a dull English winter since. And, though it has the reputation of growing rapidly and of thriving in almost any situation, it answers quickly to its surrounding human influences, and, as the Sinhalese says of his cocoanut palm, "grows best within the sound of human feet." Its presence over the cottage on the moor bears special significance to the story of the inmate. She is 103 years old. Until quite recently she has done everything for herself. Her hearing is intact, her hands are still busy with the knitting-pins, but sight, if somewhat dim of late, has opened in other directions than the spectrum. As she looks out from her door upon the wide landscape, a smile follows the eyes as they open in a great wonder like a child's in whom reverence and admiration and intuition blend in subtle harmony.

As she stands there at the door, presenting such a picture of hale and happy old age, one sees the lithe stems of the jasmine, leafless, gold-laden, bend as if to do her honour, to crown her. And one realises the sanctity of the fruition of a clear, simple, God-gladdened life. How Shakespeare, who missed this glory, must have loved to mouth those lines (when he played, if tradition lie not, the part of Adam) :—

"Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty ;

For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood,
Nor did not with unbashful forehead woo
The means of weakness and debility ;
Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
Frosty, but kindly."

There is no merit in longevity as such, otherwise the tortoise had the greater grace. But longevity with the senses sound, and the mind clear, a nest of pleasant memories, and the heart green, and the soul all starred with the blooms of faith and hope and courage, without depreciation of the present and without loss of faith in the future—this is a lusty winter, frosty but kindly. Old Dame Mallen's childhood and youth were spent in hardihood. She has always worked. She remembers harsh times. Neither in the social life of the common people, nor in the legislature has there been such a spirit of kindness as at present. She remembers times when life was harder, when the common necessities of living were three, six, and nine times more costly than now; when the poor dare not show any independence of thought or action; when they were feudal vassals of their lords, almost chattels, attached to the soil. No good old times for her. With the King's message on the wall, with the stream of visitors coming to pay homage to the oldest inhabitant, with her own interest and activity, one can well understand her belief in the present. Happily she does not read the papers, and knows nothing of the conditions of the toilers in the large industrial centres. She does not want to prolong her life, nor is she in haste to depart. As God wills. Here or elsewhere, in His hands, she fears nothing. While she can look over the hills, and hear the curlew's cry, and be awakened by the song of the larks, and watch the dawn break over an earth that has yearned for its radiance, and see that other gleam that plays within the light seen of the eyes, she is content. For her the veil is very thin, but she smiles only in answer to my questions; and as I cast my last look back in coming away, the same inscrutable smile lights up the pale face illumined by the fading rays of the westerling sun, beneath the doorway wreathed in the bower of the winter jasmine.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE AND ITS NEED OF STUDENTS.

SIR,—Dr. Beckh and Mr. Holden have let me down. At a full House meeting last year (I do not remember whether Mr. Holden was present) it was unanimously agreed that the curriculum ought to be reformed, and that, without addition to the staff, reform could be immediate, inasmuch as a student should be allowed to choose, say, two of the subjects on the prospectus to work, and could attend lectures on the others by advice. Dr. Beckh has read my letter in "some haste." He has omitted to notice my first suggestion, which was that the prospectus should be altered, and this leads him into a mistake later on. In the prospectus there is nothing to indicate to a student that "Comparative Religion," social philosophy, and the practical work of the ministry are on a different footing from the other subjects—that a student could choose to work these subjects, be examined on them, and have this work counted to his academic credit, instead of others. I did not know that, as Dr. Beckh states,* in a student's second and third years the contrary is the case. Would I had known! And if there is work on the Dunkin foundation, say, apart from lectures (and in the odd case of Mr. Graham Wallas, seminars), it has been introduced this session.

The suggestion that art cannot be taught or that religion cannot be taught (which is much the same thing as Goethe, Carlyle, &c., have known) seems to me either cynicism or blindness. Are architecture, painting, and music not taught in Germany? If not, what are Dr. Beckh's boasts of München worth, and to what end are our churches and we? The suggestion that the students should study art in the vacations (Dr. Carpenter's argument at the Discussion Society, by the way) is to me to say that teachers of religion should study religion in their holidays, and devote themselves to matters of subsidiary and arbitrary importance in their studies.

Dr. Beckh learnt the meaning of the word "student" at German universities, and that is the trouble. Unfortunately, England has been learning too much of this in the same school. But the meaning which Dr. Beckh gives in his letter is an idealised misrepresentation of what that conception really works out at in practice. Constructed teaching simply means that the teacher should give his own conclusions.

I must regret that Dr. Beckh put in inverted commas "horrid Bible," a phrase which, of course, I have never used. But the talk that the Bible has made the culture of Germany and England, including Goethe and Shakespeare (but why repeat in such details?) shows how much Dr. Beckh's scholarship is worth. And please note, Dr. Beckh, that the Bible can be studied for its intrinsic literary worth.

Mr. Lloyd Thomas found that the students of Manchester College had evidently not found enough time for devotional reading. And "a little bit more advertisement" rather gives Dr. Beckh away.

In reply to Mr. Holden, I used the word "free" in both senses he mentions. He has omitted to notice my citation of the Scotch theological colleges which have a course in natural science. I would have the compulsory amount of Biblical study reduced and the compulsory course made more "popular"—which does not mean less scholarly. In speaking of textual criticism, Mr. Holden was the victim of a label. What he meant was history of the texts, for, of course, all the work on Old Testament and New Testament is based on textual criticism. Mr. Holden is mistaken if he thinks I have any quarrel with the course at Manchester College as it affects him. His theological position renders it palatable to him, and I welcome such at Manchester College. My plea is that a course which suits his theological position ought not to be made compulsory for other theological positions. What do they know of Christianity who only Christianity know?

Yours, &c.,

ROBERT F. RATTRAY.

Kiel, Germany, January 1, 1912.

SIR,—As third and second year members of this College have written to you on this matter, it is not, perhaps, too presumptuous for a mere first year man (who has also been an "external exhibitor" of the same College for the previous four years) to express his views.

Mr. Rattray voices the feelings of those in "revolt from orthodoxy, e.g., from the Bible being the sole repository of religion." Dr. Beckh voices the diametrically opposite view. If Dr. Beckh's treatment is followed, it alienates students "in revolt from orthodoxy," whereas Mr. Rattray's treatment leaves room for those in revolt and those in sympathy with orthodoxy.

* The "Regulations affecting Candidates for Honours" obviously do not meet the case.

Mr. Rattray's suggested treatment is most in keeping with the traditions of Manchester College, and therefore I welcomed his letter, though perceiving it was "written in haste." For the first time in my five years' knowledge of Manchester College I learned from Mr. Rattray's letter that Hebrew was not a compulsory subject, even for first year men. If for that alone the letter has fulfilled one of its purposes, for there must be many others in my position of ignorance upon this matter.

Dr. Beck's remark that we have "six months' vacation" is extremely misleading to any outsider. Lectures, essays, examinations, societies, sermons, readings (to mention only some of the various work done) make term far too full and busy a period to do any real justice to the required reading work, save in vacations. Anyone who denies this statement must either possess marvellous physical powers of sitting-up into the small hours of the morning to do this reading, or he must use up those two precious hours of recreation or sport in each afternoon, without which no man can keep himself really "fit" in Oxford.

If he does neither of these two things, and yet at the same time still imagines he can keep his "six months' vacation" for his own uses, he is not, in my opinion, doing his honourable best as a "student" of this College. That he should use the hours of recreation is, in the opinion of most Oxford men, bad policy from reasons alike of health and of sociability. If I am not greatly mistaken, the power (after one's first year) to choose one's own course and to specialise upon it has only come into full operation since Mr. Rattray left the College. Now, supposing it is really necessary to judge "studentship" by the number of lectures attended, would it not be possible to fix a compulsory minimum of lectures to be attended per week by each student, while at the same time allowing each man at the beginning of term free choice of the courses of lectures he will agree to attend?

I think Dr. Beck over-emphasises the word "student." Surely religion and the churches to-day seek for and need, not merely "students," but men in every sense of the word.—Yours, &c.,

W. HARRIS CROOK.

Oxford, January 1, 1912.

SIR,—As one of those persons "actually repelled from Manchester College" by the things Mr. Rattray hinted at in his letter of December 20, I feel constrained to thank my old senior for his frank and sympathetic criticism of the college. I know his attitude well; he would agree with me that Manchester College is so good that it is a pity it is not better. Your two correspondents this week do not, I think, appreciate the spirit of Mr. Rattray's letter; if they did they would not be able to feel the need to "reply" to it.

I hesitate to say much, because my experience at Manchester College was peculiar, and, throughout my brief and stormy course there, I was treated with the greatest personal kindness and consideration. But the facts are these. I went up to Manchester College from a Congregational College in search of an atmosphere in which free development might be possible. The effect of two terms' work there was materially to hasten, if not even more largely to bring about, an attitude of scepticism which, I felt, would only be confirmed by remaining in such an atmosphere. I therefore felt compelled to leave at the end of one year.

I should plead for a more consistent carrying out of the principles of liberty for which the College stands. At present Manchester College—admittedly the most liberal and advanced of theological colleges—is still under bondage, in practice if not in theory, to the supposition that all students are pretty much the same, and can be stuffed with similar intellectual food, and then turned out as useful ministers. This appears to me to be a violation of personal values, and a failure to adapt itself to modern needs which is not made less but more deplorable on the part of Manchester College by reason of its conspicuous liberalism and efficiency in other respects.—Yours, &c.,

J. CYRIL FLOWER.

THE REAL SOURCE OF POWER IN PREACHING.

SIR,—I sometimes wonder if controversies ever open up the point of view the opener intends to raise. Words, even when carefully chosen, suggest such different interpretations to different individuals. If only critics would not assume that somebody who presents a point of view is suggesting something that is trivial, a real gain in our attitude towards each other would be made. Mr. Allen is surprised at my perplexity in not finding "in books about preaching the secret of the great preacher's power." I do not know why he should be. He asserts that "One would hardly expect to find the poet's secret revealed in a rhyming dictionary or the artist's in a manual of painting." No, I do not think anybody would. But if I opened a book on poetry and poets I should expect to find something about the natural gifts of a poet, and I ought to expect to find some treatment of this subject. There are certain things which are common to all poets, to a Milton, a Shelley, a Browning, or a Wordsworth; there are differences, too, but there are common things which unite them in one group, the group of poets, otherwise we should not know that they were poets. I simply suggest that our books on preaching leave out an essential fact in this analysis, an obvious, a fundamental, an inborn difference between the minister and the preacher. It is no answer to me to tell me, what of course I know, that a preacher is born, not made. The question I am asking is deeper, namely, what are these inborn qualities; what does the preacher, by nature and culture, love as compared with the minister? They are quite obviously not the same things. The minister is haunted by certain desires connected with the meaning of human and even animal existence, with the thought and feeling about God and the universe. The preacher, as his sermons and writings prove, has a different outlook. Many great preachers have had thoughts that are, from a religious, a literary, or a scientific view point, scarcely worth considering; other people uttering these thoughts would have exercised no influence at all. What is it that moves men and women to listen to the great preacher, while the great minister is, at any rate in his lifetime, except for a chosen few, all but disregarded? This is not an idle question, and I am not asking it in an idle way. If we recognise, and I cannot see how anyone in the very least acquainted with religious thought can deny, this difference between the born minister and the born preacher, it necessarily follows that the training for the minister and the preacher should not be of the same nature. It necessarily follows, too, that there ought to be some proportion between the number of ministers and preachers in different religious bodies. Where propagandism is the main need preachers should predominate; the Pauls, the Mohammeds, the Wickliffes of history are needed for the spirit of our day: where the glow of developing religious feeling is needed, the religious voice of a new church, even if it has to cry in the wilderness and only to be faintly heard, is as necessary.

Atmosphere counts for a great deal. The atmosphere that will develop the minister's ideal can never be the same as that which encourages the preacher's aims. The majority of all churches and chapels are badly attended by men, and although the breach between knowledge and religion shows signs of lessening, yet there is no secure bridge that has yet been built, at any rate in the popular mind, across the gap.

Is it an extreme statement to assert that religion is not the living, vital force it was a century ago; and if this be true, is it not also true that some error has caused our religious appeal to be less effective? May the cause be due to this, that greater knowledge and greater faith are both needed to-day, and that the special needs of a minister's feelings and of a preacher's have been imperfectly realised? What is the place of the minister in religious life, and what the place of the preacher? I still assert my three main positions:—

(1) That while the minister's mind is explainable, the preacher's is so far unexplained.

(2) That it is desirable to know what is the real source of power in preaching, the one motive which creates a real desire to preach.

(3) That if we knew this motive of the preacher's life we must come to realise that the training of the minister and the preacher should be different.

A change in our outlook on this subject might mean much greater influence in social life.—Yours, &c.,

J. LIONEL TAYLER.

A HUMANITARIAN APPEAL.

SIR,—May I appeal through your valuable paper to your readers to deal, when possible, with those butchers who use the R.S.P.C.A.'s painless cattle killer, which saves very great suffering. I think this is a matter about which no meat eaters can avoid a certain responsibility, and if no preference is given to those butchers who buy this humane killer and have their men taught to use it, they have no encouragement to do so.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE FRIENDS OF WILLIAM ALLINGHAM.

Letters to William Allingham. Edited by H. Allingham, and E. Banner Williams. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM was a man of many friends. This book shows that he was known, admired, and loved by a large number of the leading men of his generation. It is a question whether a man's worth may not be more truly judged by the kind of people who like him than by the work he does. After all, to be loved by your friends, if they are noble friends, is in itself a sort of work, and has an effect upon the life of the time. It means that a man is simple and sincere, and sympathetic and inspiring. William Allingham's poetry is not widely read. It probably deserves to be more popular than it is, and it may yet come to its own. The book before us makes it evident that his poetry was much admired by many of the best judges of his time, and it makes still more evident the fact that he was honoured and beloved by them. He must have had a personality which was full of charm and attractiveness. He did not live in any little mutual admiration coterie. He had amongst his most intimate and best friends such different types of men as Leigh Hunt, Carlyle, Browning, Tennyson, Burne-Jones, Rossetti, Landor, Morris, Millais, Thackeray, and Ruskin. The acquaintance began usually through his poems and then deepened into friendship through contact with himself. He was without the hall-mark of university training; he was an obscure excise officer, first at Ballyshannon, in the west of Ireland, and then at Lymington, in Dorset. He did not owe anything to family influence or wealth. He did not force himself on public notice through any brilliant work. Gradually, almost imperceptibly, he won his way into the hearts of the leading men and women of his generation. The newspapers did not say much about him. His was essentially a "succès d'estime," the esteem of the best whose esteem was most worth having. Here is an extract from a letter of Mrs. Carlyle:—

"Dear Mr. Allingham,—You are not taking it ill of me that I did not thank you for your poems before reading them? I have now read every line of those poems—a great praise in itself, considering the anti-poetic atmosphere I live in, and how impatient I am become, at second-hand, of the general run of poems: and, to speak quite sincerely, I find all of them good reading, and some of them really beautiful and worth getting by heart. The 'Dream' in particular pleases me, and one verse of it brought a gush of tears from my eyes; and if you knew what remarkably dry eyes I read with generally—nay, live with generally—you would attach some importance to this manifestation of feeling."

Burne-Jones writes: "Dear Old Pote—Can't move at present. Come and see me. Come for a week at once; come on Saturday and be made much of. Send a line and say so. You shall be petted ever so. Your yearning friend, Ned."

Mrs. Browning writes from Florence, shortly before her death: "Write to us, dear Mr. Allingham, my husband says, sending you his love. Don't fancy I look quite as black as in my portrait; in spite of the knocks I have had from English critics."

Madame Bodichon writes: "I heard to-day such bad news: you heard me speak of Lauret, the painter? He is dead: I am so grieved. His dear little wife writes to say all his aspirations, all his love of nature, his toil, his watchings, have brought him nothing but quatre planches de sapin (four fir-boards). After all, he was much happier than so many who are called fortunate—only, only, I am so sorry he is dead! I do not like death, I tell you. Nothing can make me like it."

This is one of the letters which makes us wish we had Allingham's reply. He evidently did not share the deep dislike of death expressed by Madame Bodichon. In her next letter she writes: "Thanks for your sermon, but I am not much consoled by it. Death is terrible to me."

Wm. Allingham's was essentially a cheerful, courageous, happy temperament. His poetry is full of a delicate love for nature, based on the feeling that there is more in nature than we see. Life and death were full of mystery and symbolism for him. Some mystics are lonely and apart, but Allingham combined with his mysticism a deep delight in the present world, and a great capacity for friendship. He had a large power of admiration, and was free from the envy and jealousy and self-seeking which are so sadly common even among poets and artists. As we think of him we are reminded of the words, "Blessed are the meek (or the gentle), for they shall inherit the earth."

THE PREVENTION OF DESTITUTION.

The Prevention of Destitution. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. Pp. 348. London: Longmans & Co. 6s. net.

"We have sought to leave behind us all controversy with regard to the Poor Law and its administration, in order to set forth, as an independent and substantive proposal, a constructive policy, by the adoption of which, as we believe, the nation could, within a very few years, get rid of the great bulk of involuntary destitution." With these words Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb set before the reader their purpose in their most recent volume. In the pages which follow the introduction are set out clearly the various causes of destitution, sickness, child neglect, mental deficiency, invalidity, old age, and unemployment; and in each case the authors suggest lines of development which, if adopted, would prevent those who suffer from these ills from falling into a state of destitution.

A very brief period has passed since these proposals were first laid before the public—in the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission—and it is a remarkable tribute to the care with which they have been thought out, and their essential reasonableness, that so much of the substance of them has passed into general acceptance. At first regarded as Utopian, when not condemned as revolutionary, the influence of these suggestions may now be traced in almost any newspaper, and a very large body of public opinion is now behind them. It is, therefore, unnecessary to restate here in detail how Mr. and Mrs. Webb propose that the area of work of certain departments of town and county councils should be extended so as to enable them to deal effectively, at an earlier stage, with those who, under present arrangements, almost inevitably come under the care of the Poor Law. Nor need one describe their proposals for dealing with that dread problem of unemployment by means of a national organisation, of which the nucleus is to be found in the Labour Exchanges now organised by the Board of Trade. Suffice it to say that this new presentation of the case is done with all the skill we expect to find in the work of these writers, and that those who have hitherto found it too heavy a task to master the proposals will find here an easy way out of their difficulties.

Of course objections, more serious than mere debating points, have been put forward to this scheme for the prevention of destitution, and advantage has been taken of this opportunity to meet these points. The book is, therefore, a valuable aid to those who have accepted the main principles, but who have had difficulty in answering objections raised by others.

The chapter which deals with Insurance as a method of preventing destitution will naturally attract attention at this moment. Although the writers advocate the adoption of insurance, they find much to criticise in the measure which has just received the attention of Parliament. To some minds it may seem paradoxical that Mr. and Mrs. Webb regret the compulsory nature of the insurance proposed. This they do on the ground that compulsory insurance, in spite of its association, as in the Bill, with the friendly societies and trade unions, loses the great virtue of these organisations, viz., the prudent foresight and thriftiness of the individual which leads him to make provision for times of sickness or of unemployment. Under the Bill, they contend, it will become a routine part of daily existence, like paying taxes, which few will say develops any marked moral fervour in the taxpayer. They further suggest that, by including workmen in receipt of low wages in a compulsory scheme, Mr. Lloyd George, instead of preventing sickness, may be adding to its volume. Malnutrition, they say, is a potent cause of sickness; insufficiency of food exists already where wages are low and consequently any deduction from wages already insufficient, no matter for how good a purpose, will still further diminish the food of the family, and so make them more liable to sickness.

A very useful section of this book deals with the place of voluntary agencies in preventing destitution. Many readers will know that it was urged against the Minority Report proposals that if they were adopted there would be no room for those associations which happily are so numerous amongst us, of voluntary social workers. Mr. and Mrs. Webb claim, we think with just cause, that their proposals really give voluntary agencies, for the first time, the chance of doing really satisfactory work. They examine very carefully the respective functions of official and voluntary assistance, and, to our mind, show satisfactorily how co-operation between the two can, and ought, to be organised.

We have chosen only a few random points for notice, but every page is full of interest and worthy of careful attention. Whether or not one agrees with all the conclusions of the writers, everyone will admire their masterly handling of facts, and the patient research which has given them such mastery. We could wish that the appeal which is made in the closing pages for the endowment of social research may not fall on deaf ears, and that other students may be enabled to follow in the train of Mr. and Mrs. Webb, may put before us, in turn, the results of their investigations, and ultimately enable us to secure health and happiness for the great mass of our fellow citizens.

THE MYSTICISM OF ECONOMICS.

The Blood of the Poor. By Godfrey Blount. London: A. C. Fifield. 3s. 6d. net.

"THE BLOOD OF THE POOR," by Mr. Godfrey Blount, will find a sympathetic comprehension in those minds—and they are many—where is taking place the new birth of mysticism. Probably "practical persons" will smile at it, or more probably ignore it. It is a re-assertion of the great prophetic contentions of Carlyle and Ruskin, and with a renewal of their "instinct of reaction" pleads once more for the recognition of spirituality in material things. The writer, who is not bound down by traditional dogmatisms though he sees in Christ the realisation of the spiritual ideal, declares that individual "conversion" is the only real corrective of the evils of our mechanical civilisation. His ostensible object is to establish Bread as the economic "Standard of Value," and the peasant-farmer as the pedestal on which a healthy society is built; the general gospel of the book is the introduction of mysticism into economics. Agriculture, the sacramental significance of which he emphasises, should be the first care and industry of the nation, and Handicraft substituted for mechanical and co-operative industry; while the avoidance of an excessive personal expenditure should maintain a wholesome balance between Agriculture and Handicraft. In the spirit of Ruskin and the Pre-Raphaelites, the writer turns from the ugliness, the specialised intelligence, the automatic industrial slavery, the brutal demands of electrified machinery narrowing men down to the unceasing exercise of a single, and that often quite an elementary, faculty; to the idealism, the sincerity, and the beautiful symbolism which seem summed up in the word mediævalism, and do undoubtedly glow softly in the work of such men as Fra Angelico and Botticelli. Unlike Ruskin, however, Mr. Blount has no hope in any central power representing collective government and State Socialism, or democratic social efforts at Social Reform, are worse than useless in his eyes. Individual conversion (which he does not confine to any exclusive form of religious propaganda) is the only hope; and this is not primarily a "moral" change, but a change of the very nature. This alone, showing us the sacred necessity of the return to the land, not only as an economic necessity, but as a religious one, can set us free from the tyranny of our environment in this mechanical age. It is pertinent to ask if all social efforts towards the removal of socially removable evils are to wait indefinitely for the admittedly slow, doubtful, and partial progress of individual conversion.

The author's estimate of mediævalism is not convincing to the historic sense. He sees one aspect in strong relief: that sweet and beautiful aspect where we do indeed rejoice in Francis as shown us by legend, and Giotto, in the stainless life of the visionary Donatello, in that curious apparent rectitude of the Renaissance artists in the midst of a perverse world. All these, and many more, "dreamed a dream of good." Nevertheless, it is a corrective of despair of men and human progress to glance at other sides of the mediæval picture: at the cruelty and baseness, the pitilessness, the fear and horror, the lust and filth, the pestilence and disease, that the matter of fact pages of the old chronicles set forth. If we are to compare mediæval days with our own, let us not only look at the naïvete of their religious beliefs; let us compare their commonplaces with the commonplaces of to-day. Bad as many of them may be, the physical ferocities of mediævalism are as extinct as Luca Signorelli's incidents of damnation are extinct. We no longer think in terms of blood, but in terms of social responsibility. The divisions of the book seem to have been given originally as lectures, and there is some overlapping and repetition. It remains interesting, suggestive, and useful as a reminder and fervent vindication of the soul.

THE TRUTH OF RELIGION

BY

Dr. RUDOLF EUCKEN,

Professor of Philosophy in the University of Jena and recently awarded a Nobel Prize.

Now first translated into English, with a special Preface by the Author, by the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, Ph.D., Jena, for some years a Student under Prof. Eucken.

"Dr. Tudor Jones is to be congratulated on the manner in which he has acquitted himself of the supremely difficult task of clothing in an English dress the profound thoughts of his teacher Professor Eucken, of Jena, on the perennial subject of religion."—The Scotsman.

"Professor Eucken will find many Christian readers to welcome his refreshing idealism."—Glasgow Herald.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, Henrietta St., Covent Garden, London, W.C.

much and varied study of the subject; in its style there is but little to betray the preacher; its temper is candid, moderate, and serious. To those readers who may be unprepared to endorse unreservedly the forms of orthodox expression into which the author's thought naturally flows, he nevertheless brings a real stimulus of suggestion and a copious store of valuable illustration. In accord with a powerful trend in modern philosophical conceptions, Mr. Steven looks upon the "soul" as a dynamical principle, not a static essence. Personality, he maintains, is not a gift but an achievement. The extent and importance of the subconscious life is illustrated and enforced; while the variety of experience and temperament receives its due in the recognition that different types and degrees of religious development are both actual and estimable. For example, the process of "conversion" is shown to take different shapes in different men, and the man's own interpretation of the process may easily be inadequate. "But," says the author, "important as the true interpretation is, it is not of the first importance. This alone is vital, that there be a clear decision to live for God, whatever be the final language in which it is expressed. Men of historic name, like Mazzini, Ruskin, Bismarck, make their decision, and thereafter they spend their strength not for their own ends of pride, ambition, pleasure, but for the peace, the freedom, the elevation, and the bettering of mankind. . . . The great spiritual warfare of the world has been shared by those soldiers of humanity. There is a sense in which it is true to say that they are moved by the Spirit of God; and the time when they first felt His call and consecrated themselves to the work was the time of their conversion." This passage illustrates the general temper of the book; and the reader is therefore not surprised to observe that the author includes a passage from the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "God and the Soul" among the testimonies cited as instances of "the capture of the soul by God."

On the whole, the book will probably prove more serviceable to students of the religious life, and especially to preachers, than if it had been cast into a more rigorously scientific mould; and one is glad to be in the company of a writer so earnest and, at the same time, so broad-minded.

THE STORY OF ISRAEL AND JUDAH. By the Rev. H. J. Chaytor, M.A. London: Blackie & Son. 5s.

"It ought assuredly to be possible so to teach the historical parts of the Old Testament to those who have reached the age of fifteen or sixteen that, when they enter into manhood, they may have nothing to unlearn on the ground of either science or history." These wise words of Dr. Driver formed the ideal which Mr. Chaytor set before himself in writing this book. Difficulties are, therefore, frankly faced, and moral problems discussed in simple and lucid language. At length, even by conservative scholars, with whom Mr. Chaytor takes his stand, the Bible is interpreted like any other book, as Benjamin Jowett in vain desired it should be in his day. The period covered by this book is that from Abraham to Nehemiah. The maps and illustrations are numerous and good, and marginal references to the Scriptural narrative keep the reader in touch with the text of the Old Testament. "The Story of Israel and Judah" should find a place on the shelves of our day and Sunday schools.

COMPLETE WORKS OF E. BRONTË—Edited by Clement Shorter. WUTHERING HEIGHTS. London: Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s. net.

"SHE should have been a man: a great navigator," said M. Héger of his pupil, Emily Brontë. "Emily does the baking and attends to the kitchen," says Charlotte in her diary in 1839. The two sides of her character are well illustrated by these extracts. She was a woman of the loftiest gifts of intellect and imagination. Yet she was content cheerfully and uncomplainingly to do the daily round of work in the quiet parsonage.

The cult of the Brontës grows apace, and admirers of Emily, undoubtedly the greatest of the three sisters, will rejoice in the publication of the second volume of her complete works, containing "Wuthering Heights." The extraordinary power of her only prose work has been admitted by all competent critics. The grim, grey tragedy of it carries us along breathlessly as though through a wild and whirling storm, broken only by an occasional gleam of sunshine. But its wealth of creative imagination, of pure passion at white heat reveals the presence of a master mind, one of the elemental spirits that are one with air and sea and sky. Though the characters and scenes depicted are terrible and revolting to an almost intolerable degree, it is refreshing, spite of all its sombreness, to turn to a book of such strength and power as a change from the too frequently shallow and artificial novel of to-day. It is, perhaps, hard to realise that such characters can exist in the actual world of men and women. But undoubtedly they do. And nothing but a ray of the everlasting mercy can quicken the divine spark that lies hidden somewhere in the depths even of the dark soul of a tyrant like Heathcliff. Mr. Clement Shorter writes a most informing and interesting introduction to this volume.

THE SMALLER CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS. Judges and Ruth, edited by J. Sunderland Black, LL.D., and A. W. Sheane, D.D.; Proverbs, edited by Rev. J. R. Coates, B.A.; Joel and Amos, edited by J. C. H. How, M.A.; Kings, edited by T. H. Hennessy, M.A. Cambridge University Press. 1s. net each.

THE latest volumes of this series are on the same lines as their predecessors. As is the case with English commentaries, these dealing with Old Testament literature are less traditional in interpretation and exegesis than those which explain Gospel and Epistle. In the Introductions and Notes, some of the most assured results of critical investigation are contained. Incidentally we may learn how valuable these are even to the young mind, and how easily and naturally the critical process may be set forth. It is not too much to say that the careful reading of such books as these would bridge the gulf which separates the pew from the pulpit, and make less mysterious to the average worshipper occasional allusions by the preacher to the commonplaces of Biblical scholarship.

The teaching of Scripture in schools will be made more profitable and interesting by the use of the Smaller Cambridge Bible. The new edition is handsome in appearance, and endowed with all the virtues of volumes issued by the Cambridge Press.

BYWAYS OF GHOSTLAND. By Elliott O'Donnell. Wm. Rider & Son. 3s. 6d. net.

"I wants to make your flesh creep," said the Fat Boy on a certain famous occasion; and the same ambition seems to have inspired Mr. O'Donnell to write the book which lies before us. Banshees and were-wolves, elementals and poltergeists, vampires and phantom animals, to say nothing of ghosts of a more familiar type, press hot-foot through his pages; and anyone who enjoys tales of a blood-curdling nature will find here horrors enough to please him set forth in terms which are often both picturesque and forcible. Although the book purports to be a veracious account of facts, however, its tone is unscientific in the extreme—the final court of appeal being apparently the author's individual "sensations." The psychological theories which underlie his interpretation of his experiences are certainly fallacious, and the book as a whole by its dogmatic assertions will, we fear, hinder rather than help the advance of truth in a region where her path is already strewn thickly enough with stones of stumbling.

LITERARY NOTES.

AMONG the forthcoming volumes in Messrs. Dent's popular "Everyman" Library will be included Boehme's "Discourse of Two Souls," Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," with an introduction by Mr. Horace B. Traubel, "The History of Queen Elizabeth's Reign," which will form the completion of Froude's "History of England," and "Arthurian Romance," including Geoffrey of Monmouth's Chronicle, Layamon's Brut, and Wace's Arthurian Episodes translated by Mr. Eugene Mason. The February batch of volumes will bring up the number of books published in this most useful series to six hundred.

THE Rev. A. H. Crauford, author of "Recollections of James Martineau," has written a book entitled "The Religion and Ethics of Tolstoy," which will shortly be published by Messrs. Unwin. It is an attempt to present Tolstoy in the double rôle of religions teacher and philosopher, and the book, which is said to give a careful analysis of his religious ideas, will be at once a criticism and an appreciation.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL will shortly publish a new work by the late Mr. Arthur Lillies, author of "India and Primitive Christianity," entitled "Rama and Homer." Mr. Lillies had been at work on this book for a considerable time when he died last November. In it he traces out the many similarities which exist in the Iliad and Odyssey and the Ramayana, the Epic of Hindustan.

THE price of the English Review has been reduced to 1s. without the size of the magazine being altered, and the January number shows no falling off in the quality of the articles contributed to it. Haldane Macfall writes in his characteristic and arresting way on "The Puritan and the Theatre," contending that the art of the theatre is not to amuse, but to widen our view of life, uniting us emotionally with our fellows, and enriching the imagination with "far more thrilling things than laughter." Henry Newbolt has also a good deal to say that is stimulating and trenchant in his "New Study of English Poetry," which is to be continued; Frederic Harrison continues his scholarly talk about books, and Walter Sickert contributes an article on etching under the title of "The Old Ladies of Etching-Needle-street."

THE New Year brings us a batch of useful books of reference, including the indispensable "Who's Who," "The Who's Who Year-Book," made up of the tables that originally formed such a popular feature of the first-mentioned volume; the "Englishwoman's Year-Book," with its numerous articles and detailed information on subjects which all women who take part in public or social life are interested in; the "Writers' and Artists' Year-Book," and Fry's "London Charities." In addition to these we have received the handy "Pocket Book and Diary," the "Essex Hall Year-Book," and the "Directory of Unitarian Ministers and Congregations" from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

IF you were asked some of the reasons why you would not like to be poor, I wonder what they would be? I fancy that one of the first you would mention is that if you were poor you would hardly ever have anything that was new. All of us like new things. The girls like new dresses, and the boys (although they are not so ready to own it) like new suits. I remember well how proud I was when a little boy of a sailor suit I had; especially was I proud of the whistle. It would not have mattered to me, I am sure, if the suit had not fitted, so long as the new whistle would blow.

We like the new page of a book, and that is really what a new year is. When we turn over in our copy-books we make up our minds not to make any more blots, to write carefully and evenly, and to make it the best book we have ever written. Oh, you may say, a year is about the time the earth takes to go round the sun. Yes, but who knows when it starts? There can really be no beginning fixed; and I daresay you know that at the time when Charles I. was king, New Year's Day was March 25. But even if a new year does not mean much more than what the almanac says, we like to make a new beginning; the old page in the book of life is completed, and we turn over to the new.

How good it is to have new things. A writer has given us a story of "A World Without a Child." It tells how men and women grew tired of looking after children, and asked God that no more might be sent. Their prayer was granted, and not only were there no more babies, but there was no young grass, no new trees or flowers, and no new lambs. For a time those men and women were glad that they were spared so much trouble that once they had had; but after a time the world seemed to look very old and musty, the people in it wished so much that they could see a little green grass or a young tree sprouting into leaf, or, most of all, a little child playing; for all who were once children had grown to be men and women, and wrinkles and frowning foreheads were much more common than smiles and dimples. So they prayed God to forgive them their foolish prayer, and God heard them. There was young life once more, and they said they would never ask so awful a thing again.

So we like the new, fresh page that the year 1912 seems to give us. I daresay there are many blots and smears in the previous pages we would like to take out, but they must remain; we cannot commence a new book. I remember how I used when at school to try to alter mistakes, or take out smudges, by scratching with a pen-knife, but how much worse it often made it! The exercise book would be returned with a large blue circle round the place where the page was spoiled, and marks taken off, perhaps chiefly because of the scratching. It would have been better to have left the error or the blot and hoped for the teacher's forgiveness. That is what we must do with our faults. You remember how frightened Robinson Crusoe was, when, thinking his island was uninhabited, he found footprints on the seashore. I once learned a piece of poetry about that incident, one of the verses of which I have never forgotten:

"And we, too, have our visitors
When wicked passions come,
But they don't stay long with us
Unless we give them room.
What then disturbs our rest
If no longer they're at hand?
Just this—they leave their marks behind
Like the footprints in the sand."

So our past faults leave traces in us; we cannot alter what has gone, but we can ask God to forgive us, as He surely will.

It is better to write our page and to make mistakes than not to try to write at all; better to try to do some good work even if we do make flaws in it, than to be idle. God doesn't expect us to do what grown-up people can, any more than your teacher would ask a boy or girl in the infant class to write words before it had learned pothooks. When I was a boy I used to think I wrote a very good hand; now if I come across any early writing of mine it almost makes me shudder. But I suppose it was good for my age, and however young you may be there is a "best" for you to do.

There is one great difference between the books at school and what I am calling the Book of Life, and that is that at school you can count how many pages you have left; in life we never can. That is why we should write well from the commencement, for any page may be our last. If we make a mess of the first few pages of our exercise-book the book is always a soiled and marred one; and if we are careless and unkind when we are young we shall probably never forget it, though we may be much better when we grow older. Not only, too, are we writing, as it were, a book for ourselves, we are writing the great book of our nation's history. It is not only the men in Parliament, in the army and the navy, that make England; it is also the boys and girls at school who will one day become her men and women. Surely, too, some of these must be men and women as great as any that have ever lived. There is a beautiful parable of Laura Richards' called "The Torch Bearer." It tells how a man stood by the wayside looking for the great future deliverer to come. As he stood a voice was heard crying, "Room, room for the Torch-bearer, room for the keeper of the gates of to-morrow." "Ah," he said, "I shall see the wise man who has brought light to our minds for many a year. He will bear the torch." But the wise man came by, his eyes bent forward, seeing many things, but he held no torch. Again the cry arose, "Room for the Torch-bearer, make way, make way for the keeper of the gates of to-morrow." "Oh," said the man, "it will be the mighty leader who has led us with a wave of his hand. Hail to the Master of Armies!" But when the soldier came he was looking downward, remembering, and no torch was in his hand. Yet again came the cry, "Room, room, make way, give place; the Torch-bearer comes. Make way for the keeper of the gates of God." Once more the man looked. A woman came along, bare, and with bare and dusty feet. She was bowed, and stumbled over the rough stones, for in her hand was a great torch, and on her arm a baby. He sat there, as if on a throne, and laughed and leaped and took hold of the torch, and shook it so that the light streamed along the path before him. So, boys and girls, you are writing the early pages of England's future book, and writing the future Bible which shall contain the record of all good and noble things which those who follow Jesus have tried to do in his spirit.

It is a new year, but there are old truths. Nathaniel Hawthorne tells us of an arm-chair which had been in existence some hundreds of years, and the owner one day said to it, "Since you have lived so long you must know what makes men really happy; tell us." The arm-chair waved its arms about, and then made a very short speech. "Justice, Truth, and Love," it said. "Is that all?" said the owner, rather disappointed. "Yes," said the arm-chair, "but from the way in which men live I shouldn't have thought they knew it, but if I hear of anything more that really makes men happy I will speak again." But the arm-chair never said anything more—because it had nothing else to say.

If Jesus lived again he could say nothing but that. He would tell us that we must love one another and God, for they are the two great commandments. The apostle John, who had that wonderful vision in the island of Patmos, heard the voice from Heaven say, "Behold, I make all things new." So does the teaching of Jesus still. We see the world as a fresh, new world, and, trying to live for others, we live a new life ourselves. To endeavour to do that is to have for ourselves, and to bring for those whose lives we touch, the happiest of New Years. W. K.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE event of the past week, so far as the world of social work is concerned, has been Mr. Lloyd George's South Wales speech. No single sentence in it revealed anything that has not been the commonplace of the social worker for years past. What is remarkable is the fact that the churches have had to be reminded of their duty by a politician—and, as a rule, taking politicians as a class, one does not look to them for moral and spiritual inspiration, and to be instructed in some elementary facts in sociology, which, after all that has been written on the subject by able and disinterested men during the last generation, ought to have been known to every member of every Christian Church in the land. Full reports of the speech have already appeared broadcast, and there is no need to quote at length from it; but it is permissible to underline the statements that poverty is not the design of Providence, that in the richest empire under the sun there are millions of men, women, and children who for no fault of their own are condemned to a life of poverty, wretchedness, and despair: and that to-day we have a more severe economic bondage than we probably ever had, for grinding labour to-day does not always guarantee sustenance or security, a condition of things which was foreign to the barbaric régime of darker ages. Two sentences may be repeated in the form in which they were spoken:—"It is the business of the Churches to insist on the facts being known, to insist on every man realising his own individual responsibility in the brotherhood of the race. It is their business also to teach every man that he has got to sacrifice in order to help."

AMONGST other items on the interesting programme of the Student Christian Movement, which held its annual conference at Liverpool this week, is an exhibit of the publications issued by the Social Service Unions of the different branches of the Church. There are now about a dozen such unions, and some others are in process of formation. All of them have published pamphlets, syllabuses of study, &c., and some even have advanced so far as to issue books. The literature secretary of the Inter-denominational Conference of Social Service Unions, Rev. A. E. Baker, of Dudley, arranged for exhibit a complete set of all the literature issued by all the Unions. All of these, one is glad to say for the credit of the churches, are strong in enthusiasm, but not one of them is numerically or financially as strong as the importance of their work demands. It is to be hoped that this exhibit will have served to bring the literature of the social question, approached from the ethical and religious side, to the notice of the large public to whom the Student Christian Movement appeals.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

A SERIES of twelve lectures, beginning on Wednesday, January 10, at 8 p.m., on "Some Aspects of the Influence of Greek Philosophy on Mediæval and Modern Thought," is to be given by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed at the University of London. Tickets, price one guinea, can be obtained from the Registrar, University Extension Board, University of London, South Kensington, S.W.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bradford Chapel-lane Chapel.—The last day of 1911 brought the Rev. H. McLachlan's ministry to a close. On December 28 a farewell meeting and social gathering was held, about 100 friends being present. The chair was occupied by the senior warden, Mr. J. H. Brook, and suitable addresses were delivered by neighbouring ministers and members of the Church. The final services were held on Sunday, December 31, when Mr. McLachlan preached in the morning on "Peace." In the evening the sermon was of the nature of a farewell. Mr. McLachlan's ministry is being brought to a speedy close in order that he may take up duties as Tutor at the Home Missionary College at an early date.

Edinburgh: St. Mark's Church.—On Saturday, December 16, a meeting of the Edinburgh branch of the Unitarian Women's League was held in the church hall, when a presentation was made to Mrs. S. H. Mellone in acknowledgment of her services as secretary, on the occasion of her leaving Edinburgh. In returning thanks, Mrs. Mellone said she needed no testimonial to keep her in mind of St. Mark's, and expressed the hope that she would have many opportunities of re-visiting her old friends.

Hackney: New Gravel-Pit Church.—On Sunday evening, December 31, the first of a series of special musical services was held. In spite of the holiday season, there was a good congregation. The series will be continued on the last Sunday evening of each month.

Mansfield: Old Meeting House.—During the last four Sundays, morning and evening, a course of special sermons has been given by the minister, the Rev. F. H. Vaughan. The morning course, entitled "A Poet's Christmas," dealt with the poets Milton, Crashaw and Francis Thompson, Browning, and Tennyson. The evening sermons were on "Dickens and the Message of Christmas," and both courses have been much appreciated.

An entertainment of a unique character was given by the members and friends of the Band of Hope in the schoolroom, on Saturday, December 30. The idea, inspired by the minister, was an endeavour to convey to the minds of the children by means of tableaux the incidents of the birth of Jesus, as given in the Gospels. The opening scene was a family party Christmas tree, and the accompanying Christmas Eve festivities were carried out as in Germany, interspersed with the singing of Christmas hymns and carols. Following this were various tableaux illustrating the shepherds in the fields, and the appearance of the angels, the Babe Jesus with Mary and Joseph in the stable of the inn, the coming of the shepherds to worship, and the wise men offering their gifts. The performance was well carried out, and was greatly enjoyed by all present.

National Unitarian Temperance Association.—Mr. E. F. Cowlin, hon. secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, writes to us as follows:—"Will you kindly grant me space in your columns to say that, although the funds of this Association are so low, the Committee do not like to discontinue any of the work, and especially such an event as the New Year Entertainment to London Band of Hope members, so this will be given on January 20, at Essex Hall, at 6.30 p.m. As on the last occasion part of the programme will be provided by the children themselves and part by their teachers and other friends. Any sympathisers with temperance work will be heartily welcomed on that occasion, and donations towards the cost of the entertainment are solicited." Mr. Cowlin's address is, 40, Marler-rd., Forest-hill, S.E.

Richmond: Ormond-road Free Church.—The calendar of the Richmond church, of which Dr. Foat is the minister, for January, February, and March, contains the following interesting announcements:—

On all first Sundays, the morning subject is of general philosophic interest, dealing with laws of Reason, and the progress of Science, in their relation to the great religious theories of Life, such as the Fatherhood of God.

On second Sundays, the morning subject is of ethical interest; the history of mankind and the story of the efforts of the race towards goodness; positive morals and ethical tendencies, especially in relation to the Brotherhood of Man.

On each third Sunday morning some study of the beautiful in nature and in human life; the inspiration and works of the great artists in literature, architecture, painting, &c.; and the finer effects of higher thought and culture, such as grace, mercy, friendship, peace.

On the last Sunday morning in every month a sermon is preached on a text, usually from the Bible. In the evenings music and poetry, social questions, educational topics, and the events of the month will be dealt with,

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE ORIGIN OF "PLOUGH MONDAY."

How many dwellers in the town (writes a correspondent in the Manchester Guardian) have heard of "Plough Monday" or know its significance? It falls on January 8, being the first Monday after Twelfth Day, and is so called because it is the end of the Christmas holidays and the day when men return to their plough, or daily work. It was an old custom for farm labourers on this day to draw a plough from door to door of the parish and beg "plough money" for a final frolic. One wonders if this custom still survives. In the same way January 7 is called St. Distaff's Day, because on the following day women return to their distaff, or daily occupation. As the old poet says—

Give St. Distaff all the right,
Then give Christmas sport good night,
And next morrow every one
To his own vocation.

Apparently we have always been rather generous with ourselves in the matter of holidays in this country.

THE ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.

The complete record of work for the past year, issued a few days ago by the Royal Humane Society, shows a total of 873 cases of gallant action in saving or attempting to save life, a number largely in excess of any previous year in the society's history. Five hundred and eighty-eight of these cases occurred in England, 90 in Scotland, 69 in Ireland, 52 in Wales, and the remainder in India, the Colonies, or in various foreign countries. Fifty-three men of the naval or coastguard services and 26 men of the land forces are among those rewarded, as also are 45 men of the police within the United Kingdom. It is interesting to note that 142 of the rescuers were of the age of 15 or under.

A TOLSTOY OF THE TRANSVAAL.

An interesting account was given in the Daily News this week of the life that Mr. Ghandi, the brilliant Indian barrister, who has so strenuously advocated the cause of the British Indians in the Transvaal, leads on the hundred-acre farm near Durban which was recently handed over to him. Mr. Ghandi's name is well known to many people in England, but few realise how completely he has adopted the principles of Tolstoy, not only by giving up his small fortune for social causes, and by going to prison to protest against the unjust laws which his fellow-countrymen have passively resisted, but by doing the hardest and meanest work upon the land in addition to teaching a school and making shoes. "He does the work of ten men," says the actual owner of the farm, a well-known architect of Johannesburg, "sitting up all night with someone sick and beginning manual work in the morning as early as anyone. . . He believes that politics and religion are not activities apart from life, but must be put into effect in every phase and detail of life. He teaches not by words but by deeds. Words can be misunderstood, but not deeds."

THE RIVERSIDE AT SOUTHWARK.

Replying to a recent letter in The Times on "A Hidden Cathedral," Archdeacon Taylor writes to the same paper, expressing his agreement with the question raised as to the possibility of something being done to rescue St. Saviour's, Southwark, from its present obscurity. He desires, however, not so much to clear away the adjacent buildings for the purpose of revealing the stately proportions of this beautiful church, though that is a worthy object, as to give the dwellers in its crowded neighbourhood a much-needed open space. Such a space with access to the fresher air of the river would be an immense boon to Southwark, which is very badly off in this respect.

* * *

"The vision of a garden with trees and an embankment between the Cathedral and the river, covering the site once occupied by the cloisters and other buildings of the Priory, and by the town house of the Bishops of Winchester adjoining," says the writer, "is almost too good to be true. Once this spot seen from bridge or river was beautiful—a stately group of buildings, of which the Church alone remains, rising above the green of its field and orchard. Is it possible to make it beautiful again? The present grim frontage looks impregnable. But let others press this who are more capable of weighing its importance as a feature in a city that tends to become more beautiful."

SOME SCHOOLBOY "HOWLERS."

The following examination "howlers" have been published in the Christmas number of a Nottingham School Magazine:

Elijah, the Fishbite, dropped his mantle, and Queen Elizabeth walked over it.

Parliament assembled in September and dissembled in the following January.

Pitt returned with a majority of 120, which was known as Fox's martyrs.

A vacuum is an empty space full of nothing but Germans (? germs).

Flannellette peril is petticoat government.

Five minerals other than metals: Lemonade, ginger beer, &c.

AN INSTITUTE FOR TYPISTS.

The business girl is now as much a part of the social order as the business man, but so far very little seems to have been done to improve her lot, which is not always of the brightest. An Institute of Women Shorthand Typists has, however, just been formed which seems to promise better things. A large club or reception room is to be opened in London where girls looking for work may meet. A holiday fund and employment bureau are also to be established, and it is intended that arrangements shall be made with three or four good restaurants to supply the members with cheap lunches. The subscription for the three stages of membership is 5s., 7s. 6d., and 10s. per annum. There will be no entrance fee for the first 5,000 members, the reason being that no time may be lost in enrolling sufficient members to enable the institution to qualify as an "approved" society under the Insurance Act. Book-keepers and women clerks are ultimately to be admitted.

PROGRESS OF TEETOTALISM IN EUROPE.

Statistics of the recent progress of the temperance movement on the Continent are encouraging to the teetotaller, small as the figures seem. In Switzerland, the Blue Cross Society has nearly 26,000 members, and both there and in Germany the Good Templar movement is making headway. In Holland, which has an unenviable notoriety as a beer-drinking country, the number of pledged abstainers has grown from 3,000 in 1896 to 50,000 in 1911, and in a few localities resolutions in favour of total prohibition have been carried. A Paris paper recently announced that "the consumption of alcohol is diminishing in France, and the bigger the city the more marked is the diminution." In cities where the population is over 50,000 the total consumption of alcoholic liquors has decreased by one-half.

CHARLES DICKENS AND HIS CHILDREN.

Miss Mamie Dickens, the eldest daughter of Charles Dickens, is contributing a series of articles on her father to that popular American magazine, The Ladies' Home Journal. The first one deals with the home-life of the novelist, and contains the simple prayer which he taught his little ones to repeat night and morning:—"Pray God, who has made everything, and is so kind and merciful to everything He has made who tries to be good and to deserve it. Pray God bless my dear papa, mamma, brothers and sisters and auntie, and all my relations and friends. Make me a good little girl. Let me never be naughty, or tell a lie, which is a mean and shameful thing. Make me kind to my nurses and servants and to all poor people. Let me never be cruel to any dumb creature; for if I am cruel to anything, even to a poor little fly, Thou, who are so good, will never love me. Pray God to bless and to preserve us all this night and forevermore, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

* * *

"As tiny babies," says Miss Dickens, "kindness to and consideration for others were qualities taught us even before we could speak, and my father was quick to notice any breach of such observance on our part, as he was also in the case of grown-up people. He hated anything like rudeness or selfishness to servants or subordinates. The same spirit actuated him in regard to the invocation: 'Let me never be cruel to any dumb creature.' Any act of cruelty, however so-called small, was loathsome to him, and seemed really to hurt him and to fill him with disgust." It could scarcely have been otherwise with a man so full of the milk of human kindness.

The Writing on the Wall

If you are dissatisfied with your present work, your present rate of pay, if you want to improve your position, then "The Writing on the Wall" means something for you; but without investigation you will not be a step further towards materialising your ideals.

When in competition for a good job the battle is half won if you are an I.C.S. man. The simple fact that you have had an I.C.S. training tells employers that you know your business technically, theoretically, practically. I.C.S. men have their heads in their work—and employers know it.

Example:—

"At my first interview with the Manager I informed him I was a student of the I.C.S. and he replied: 'Yes, you mentioned that fact in your letter or you would not be here now'; which clearly shows the value of C.I.S. training."

(Signed) D. J. BETHELL, Nottingham.

Salary Increased 100 per cent.

"It gives me great pleasure to thank you for your kindness in obtaining for me a position. I applied to your Students' Aid Department, with the result that in a very short time you obtained for me a position carrying with it an increase of 100 per cent. in wages."

(Signed) H. ELTON, Royton, Lancs.

Let us refer you to I.C.S.
students in your district.

When a man is I.C.S. trained he has become a master of his work, and he wants the best possible price for his brains and skill. In this connection the value of the work of the I.C.S. Students' Aid Department, acting hand-in-hand with over 1,000 personal representatives all over the United Kingdom and throughout the Colonies, cannot be over-estimated.

During twelve months the average increase of earnings reported by I.C.S. students reached the remarkable figure of 54 per cent. in Great Britain alone!

The I.C.S. will train you without interruption to your daily work at a cost to suit your pocket. All books free. No classes to attend. No restrictions, no extras. All preliminary information given free.

Inquire into the Facts to-day.

"The way to Better Pay is the I.C.S. way"—over 100,000 I.C.S. students affirm it is so.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A PASSIONATE indictment of militarism and of the attitude of the Great Powers towards weaker races has been published in the Figaro by Pierre Loti. "Everywhere," he exclaims, "we are destroying with our mitrailleuses civilisations different from ours, which we despise without understanding them, simply because they are less practical, less utilitarian, and less heavily armed. And when we have finished killing we bring our unbridled exploitation, our gangs of workmen, our large factories which are destructive of the small personal industries, and agitation, ugliness, drunkenness, cupidity and despair. . . . In the eyes of Europe the Moslems of all countries are but so much game which it is permissible to shoot, and this shooting is generally successful, thanks to the superiority of Europe's killing machines."

AFTER a vehement protest against the Italian war in Tripoli M. Loti concludes : "I foresee with calmness the insults which this demonstration of mine will bring upon me on the part of certain maniacs, interested or blind, who confound civilisation with railways, exploitation, and murder. They will not reach me in the retreat where my life is about to finish. I approach the term of my earthly sojourn. I do not desire or dread anything. But so long as I can make my voice heard by somebody, I shall regard it as my duty to say what appears to me to be the truth. Down with the wars of conquest, whatever the pretexts by which they are excused, and shame on the butcheries of human beings !"

It is easy to dismiss words like these as fanatical. They have in them some of the fanaticism of the Hebrew prophets on behalf of national righteousness, and of the early Christians in their respect for human life and its spiritual values. Milder words would probably be disregarded. The white heat of their indignation will be justified if it destroys some of our comfortable illusions, and forces us to ask ourselves searching questions about the meaning of civilisation and the contradiction between our religious faith in the Divine righteousness and love, and many of our political ideals.

THE Christmas holidays have become the paradise of the educational reformer. At no other time of the year is the problem of the schools so much in evidence. Meetings and conferences are held in various parts of the country, and the newspapers free from the claims of Parliament are able to devote a considerable amount of attention to their proceedings. In addition to the Head Masters' Conference, which represents the restricted world of the "Public School," there are others like the Congress of the Educational Institute of Scotland, the North of England Education Conference, and the annual Conference of Teachers arranged by the London County Council, which deal with education in many of its wider and more democratic aspects. One thing is common to them all, a feeling of unrest, the need of a revised curriculum, and the conviction that education and all the opportunities of the school and the university must be organised in accordance with the highest ideals of national efficiency. In spite of a few protests and some sporadic signs of reaction the day of sharp class divisions in education is drawing to a close. The problem of the intellectual and moral training of the people is one and indivisible.

SIR GEORGE W. KEKEWICH spoke with emphasis on this point in his address to the Congress of the Educational Institute of Scotland. There were, he said, three great barriers to educational development in England. In Scotland these barriers were comparatively unimportant, and for that the Scottish people should go down on their knees and thank Providence. In England they had the religious difficulty, or sectarianism gone mad. They had also class distinction or snobbery of the worst description ; and they had, worst of all, the poverty bar. The religious difficulty was an insult to common sense while it remained unsolved. The abominable class distinctions—catering for the rich in their schools—stood in the way of education more than anything else. It was to the advantage of the State that the best brains should have an opportunity of reaching the highest places, and that poverty should not stand in the way of admission to the public schools. Education was the first line of national defence.

AT the North of England Education Conference at Newcastle Dr. M. E. Sadler, the Vice-Chancellor of Leeds University, gave one of the stimulating addresses with which he is continually enriching the educational thought of the country. He expressed his belief in the unlikelihood of the permanent success of any attempt at the strict regulation of the educational life of a people. A complete control of education by a bureaucratic State, he urged, was inexpedient, and, even if it were wise, impracticable. On the other hand, equally inexpedient and impracticable would be the complete immunity of every educational institution from public supervision. In educational affairs laissez faire was as false a gospel as the doctrine of collectivist control. The reason for this lay in the nature of the service which education had to render. It was a semi-public and at the same time a semi-private thing. On the one hand, in the interest of the future, it was answerable to the conscience of the community as organised in the superintending power of the State. On the other hand, in the interests of spiritual and intellectual freedom, it must respond to the originality of individual conviction, and must lie open to the influence of new conceptions of life and of personal duty. In educational administration, therefore, their task was to adjust the claims of liberty to the need for public economy and public order.

ON Tuesday the Bishop of Lincoln delivered an address of marked insight and power on "Hellenism as a force in history" to the members of the Classical Association. After speaking of the influence of Hellenism upon the life and beliefs of the Jews and the strange and beautiful development of Jewish religion under the stimulus of Greek philosophy, Dr. Hicks proceeded to dwell upon the Greek influences which moulded early Christianity. In St. Paul, who had left precious records of his own religious thinking, we saw the Hellenist moving further and further away from Pharisaic Judaism, and philosophising as only a Hellenist could concerning the postulates and presuppositions of faith in Christ. There was no question of the strong impress of Hellenic thought and expression in the early Christian teachings; it was something of a shock to find the beautiful formulæ of the Johannine letters to be the commonplace of the epistolary style of the time. Later the Church took over some of the beautiful elements of the Græco-Roman culture. Christian teaching assumed more than ever a philosophic method, the rhetoric of the schools developed in the teaching of the Church, and Christian worship enriched itself in adopting the procession and the elegancies of Greek pagan ceremonial. Something, too, of the Oriental mystery cults, transformed under Greek influences, passed into the worship of the Church.

In the latter part of his address the Bishop traced the influence of the Hellenic spirit upon English thought and literature since the Renaissance. Hellenism, he said, was a pervasive influence in the English society of the hour. There had been a sensible decline in the power of traditional religion; unbelief had a deep and wide influence over the best minds and many of the best characters. He saw in the æsthetics of the hour a wonderful resemblance to ancient Greece, and in a hundred ways the life and art and thought of ancient Hellas had been brought nearer to English eyes and hearts than ever before. We breathed unconsciously Hellenic influences. He could wish that where there was an Hellenic love of liberty of thought there was an equally Hellenic love of political freedom; he could wish also that in our popular religion the vigorous and passionate mind of St. Paul could assert itself once again and work a splendid reformation. But wherever men were beginning seriously to think and feel, to desire to learn the thoughts and understand the feelings of the greatest and best that had lived before them, so long would the study of the Greeks and their literature be an essential part of the education of the world. Hellenism would ever be a force in human history.

WE have received some further letters on the subject of "Manchester College and its need of students," but as they are written by the students themselves, and do not represent either the lay-mind or the mature judgment of men who have had an opportunity of testing the value of the College training in the work of life, we have decided to close the correspondence. We published Mr. Rattray's original letter because it struck us as raising several interesting points in an incisive way and with the warmth of personal feeling and the touch of exaggeration which often lead to useful discussion, and we regret that the subject has not provoked some writers of wide knowledge or special educational experience to attack it with the illuminating sympathy and the practical insight which it requires.

As we have pointed out on more than one occasion, we believe that the subject of the training for the ministry is ripe for discussion. We should like to see a sort of royal commission on theological colleges, conducted by a selection of the best and most practical minds in all the churches. The rapid growth of knowledge has had the result of overloading the curriculum. Scholarship has become amazingly technical. Whole departments of study, where the cultivated mind once moved with ease, have become the property of experts and specialists. It is no wonder if in an atmosphere of severe and exhausting intellectual competition many practical needs, and it may be sometimes the deeper spiritual interests, are overlooked. We hope that before long a solution will be found by handing over the work of pure scholarship and research to the Universities, leaving the theological college free to devote itself to the more practical parts of divinity and the needs of the average man, who wants above all things to be helped to live the dedicated life and to do his work for human souls with effective simplicity.

HEINESQUE.

My heart's dim mansion harbours
Two rooms remote from noise;
The one holds all my sorrows,
The other, all my joys.

One door is ever open,
And, passing in and out,
Like grave-eyed elder children,
My sorrows glide about.

Their glance is deep and tender,
They hold me by the hand;
I would not close that chamber
Unless should open stand

That other door beside it—
Closed from so long ago;
Ah, then my grave-eyed sorrows
Would not pass to and fro.

Would'st thou know why that one chamber
Is closed from eve to morn?
The joys were darling children,
That died as soon as born.

THE DIALOGUES OF SAINT

"By such facts Almighty God doth declare in what sweet manner He doth tender us, when He vouchsafeth to work such pleasant miracles." So says Peter, and the particular "pleasant miracle" just related by Gregory which elicits this comment is to the following effect. In the province of Valeria a certain holy priest had been recently buried in front of a church, near certain sheep-cotes. One night when the priests were singing a thief came and carried off a wether, but as he crossed the grave he was suddenly arrested by an unseen power. "Willingly would he have let the wether go and could not, willingly also have carried it away and was not able." He was there all night, and in the morning was discovered by the priests, who (very generously) offered their united prayers on his behalf, and "scarce could they obtain that he, which came to steal away their goods, might at least find so much favour as to depart empty as he came."

But some of our readers may perhaps say, with Wordsworth's interlocutors in "Peter Bell":

"Who Peter was, let that be told,
And start from the beginning."

Let them, then, go with all convenient speed to Chartres, and in the South Porch, on the eastern side of the eastern door, the third of the figures counting from inside, they will find Gregory in splendid pontifical robes, with a dove at his ear indicating the inspiring presence of the Holy Spirit; and crouched at his feet, looking up with an expression at once of eager curiosity and complete docility, with his pencil and note-book before him, they will see Peter, Gregory's secretary, and the interlocutor in his celebrated Dialogues. If Peter performed all his secretarial duties as well as he does that of interlocutor he must have been worth his weight in gold; for as Gregory relates miracle after miracle through four books of Dialogues, Peter is always struck with fresh amazement, is always brief in his comments, always asks for more, and is always intelligent, but with an intelligence of just the limited order that enables Gregory to point out that he might have seen a little further, that his surprise might have taken a slightly different turn, and that, in short, he has still a good deal to learn which his oracle will proceed to teach him.

No one who reads the Dialogues will wonder at their popularity, but the publisher had better not have placed on the cover the statement that they are "a book worthy to stand on the shelf beside the 'Fioretti' of St. Francis." Perhaps they are, for Grimm's Fairy Tales may be worthy to stand on the shelf with Blake's "Songs of Innocence" or "The Lyrical Ballads"; but the statement is not illuminating. Everyone knows the lovely story of the tender expostulation by which Francis melted the heart of the savage wolf that used to destroy man and beast, round Gubbio: and how the wolf came into the market-place and putting his front paw in Francis's hand promised to do evil no more, while Francis on his part promised that the citizens would be kind to him and give him plenty of food, "for I know that you did all this harm because you were so hungry": and how the wolf endeared himself to every inhabitant of the place, and how they missed him when he died of old age. Now the story of Boniface in the "Dialogues" is a good one. But the best way to recommend it is not to say that it is worthy to stand side by side with the wolf tale. A fox had raided his mother's hen-roost, and he prayed earnestly that God would not allow his poor mother's living to be thus taken away from her, whereat the fox herself brought back the stolen bird and fell down dead upon the spot! Again, when Francis once on a time, being exceedingly weary, was riding for a while on an ass, his companion Brother Leonard, not a little tired himself, began inwardly to fret. His parents would not have deigned to play with this man's parents; "and there is he riding while I trudge on foot," he thought. Francis, knower of hearts, slipped from the ass and cried, "No, Brother, it is not fitting that thou should'st walk and I should ride, for thou wert the nobler and mightier, when we were in the world." But Brother Leonard, bathed in tears, implored pardon for his evil thought. Now Gregory tells the story of a certain monk of high parentage who was holding the candle for St. Benedict when he was at supper, and began to say within himself: "Who is he, that I thus wait upon at supper, and hold him the candle? And who am I, that I should do him any such service?" Benedict rebuked him severely, and forthwith called another of the monks and bade him take the candle out of his hands. But, after all, is it not being overcome of evil to yield to the seduction of a foolish advertisement, and write of Gregory's Dialogues as if all that was to be said of them is that they breathe not the spirit of St. Francis?

Let us take them, then, on their own merit. It is the note of a good book that it remains good when it has become utterly impossible to take it as its writer and its original readers took it, or perhaps even to take it seriously. What will this age say of the benevolent gentleman who lent the quiet and easy-paced horse that his wife was accustomed to ride to a Bishop, but found that when it was returned it utterly scorned to allow the back that had been bestridden by a bishop to be sat upon by a woman, and became entirely unmanageable? The good husband perceived what sacrilege he had been guilty of, and made the horse a permanent present to his episcopal friend. Or what of the man who, tired and irritated after a long journey, sat down and cried to his servant, "Here, you devil, untie these boot-laces," and before the poor knave had stirred perceived to his horror the boot-laces rapidly unknitting and untwining themselves? The devil had taken him at his word. But a few vigorous cries of exorcism banished the fiend, leaving the traveller, however, properly impressed with the vigilant presence of the devil at all times and in all places, and his eagerness to find an excuse for entering into closer relations with anyone who would take notice of him.

In one story a devil appears very charmingly as an injured innocent. A woman had imprudently eaten a lettuce without making the sign of the cross over it, and was promptly seized with agonising convulsions. The holy Equitius was sent for in all haste. He rebuked the devil that had entered into the woman, but he said (very reasonably), "Why, what have I done? I was only just sitting on a lettuce, and she came and ate me up!" This, however, would not do. It is an idée fixe in the mind of the true saint that the devil was a liar from the beginning, and even if he happens to speak the truth it is by accident and is irrelevant.

The following is a pleasing story, and one, too, that incidentally illustrates the terrible background of violence and ruin against which Gregory's pictures are painted. There was a certain presbyter of the name of Sanctulus, who in vain implored a band of marauding Lombards to release a captive. When they refused, he asked to be allowed to act as his gaoler, to which they assented on condition that he must take his place as a captive if he allowed him to escape. As soon as they were asleep, he set the lad at liberty and awaited his fate. The Lombards good-naturedly observed that he was not a bad sort, so they would not torture him. He might choose his death. Sanctulus said that any death that God allowed them to inflict would be suitable, and they determined to behead him. He was a well-known man, and his execution was regarded as a great spectacle. Immense crowds came to attend it, and a strong and expert swordsman was chosen as executioner. The saint remained in prayer for an unreasonable time and the executioner had literally to "kick him up," and tell him to stretch out his neck, which he did with a few additional words of prayer, and the executioner having raised his sword into the air was unable to move. A revulsion of feeling took place at this miracle. Sanctulus was to be released and honoured, but was requested to intercede for his executioner and relieve him from his fixed attitude. Sanctulus agreed only on condition that the executioner would never use his sword against a Christian man again. (Observe the limitation.) All kinds of presents were then offered him, but he declined to accept anything except the liberation of his fellow-captives. This he desired in order that he might have a reasonable ground for praying for the souls of the Lombards.

The last book deals with the appearances and experiences of souls severed from the body. Some of them are decidedly thrilling. A certain knight lay sick almost to death. When he recovered he told how in a vision he had seen a great bridge stretching over a foul and fuming river to a beautiful land, where men in white walked amongst glorious mansions. He had some interesting details to give concerning some of the brothers in a neighbouring monastery. He saw one of them, Stephen, approaching the bridge and attempting to cross it. After a time he stumbled, and his body fell over the edge. A number of devils at once seized him by the loins and strove to pull him down. But angels seized him by the hands (he was a charitable person, though not altogether blameless in other respects) and strove to drag him up, and in the thick of the fight—the seer awoke. Stephen became an object of close interest and inspection from his brothers from that time forward. How he felt himself we are not told.

The charming old translation by "P. W." which Mr. Warner has issued is provided with an introduction, notes and index by Mr. Edmund Gardner, whose faultless scholarship is never out of its depth, and with illustrations of which an elaborate account is given by Mr. Hill in the index. Those who do not regard colour reproductions as in themselves and always an outrage will doubtless be pleased with most of those which appear in this book; and even those who do will find their hearts melting towards the frontispiece, and possibly towards one or two of the others. The type and binding are charming, and the book does thorough credit to all its producers.

THE USES OF LEGEND.

IN the course of my teaching tours, the subject of the uses of legend so often intrudes into the arena of discussion that I venture to transfer some of the controversy into a page of THE INQUIRER. I annex all the respectable legends I can get hold of, though it must be confessed that the process of annexation implies (what military annexations usually do not) a vast amount of deliberate rejection. For example, I conducted a grand inquisition into a store of Folk-stories from Southern Nigeria, and discovered only one example which moderately well suited my purpose of usefully entertaining little British souls. The rest were typified by the tale of the "Fat Woman who Melted Away," which thus horribly concluded:—

Ever since that time, whenever a wife behaves very badly, the husband returns her to the parents, who sell the woman as a slave, and out of the proceeds of the sale reimburse the husband the amount of dowry which he paid when he married the girl.

This is obviously not respectable enough for the Moral Education League. On the other hand, an extreme and beautiful spirituality may shine out of the quaint frame of a mediæval or Oriental legend, and render it a most stimulating agent of instruction. Of the thousand and one legends I have examined, I know none more noble than that of Yudhishtira and his four brothers—one of the gems of the Indian "Mahabharata," musically recited in Sir Edwin Arnold's "Indian Idylls." Yudhishtira will not enter heaven without his faithful dog, and when the dog is transformed into the radiant God Dharma, are we going to cancel the tale from our list because of the supernatural touch? But this question immediately leads to the practical problem as to how we ought to handle such stories in the presence of children. Shall we relate the legend without any footnote or aside of doubt? Or shall we preface it, or close it, with a warning against accepting it as a literal account of fact? In either case, we appear to be confronted by a dilemma. If we infuse doubt, we may be destroying the fair beginning of trust and even of imagination. But if we refrain from a sceptical interjection, we may be laying up for the child a time of tribulation, when he will discover that he has been misled, and will painfully unwind his soul from the entanglement of our falsehood. Like a good many other academic dilemmas, this one is solved by practical walking. Let me give a case with the help of a story drawn from Evelyn Underhill's "Miracles of Our Lady." Imagine, if you please, that we are talking to children aged eleven or twelve.

A young monk, of the order of the Benedictines, spent much time in a cell, a cool and quiet place where he brooded and read and prayed. Very often he prayed with eyes uplifted to an image of the Lady Mary, whom Catholics call the Mother of God. Every day he prayed thus; and every summer day he placed on the Lady's head a wreath of roses gathered from the monastery garden; and whenever he placed the roses on her head, she bowed in thanks.

She bowed! I wonder now. . . . Do you believe the image really bowed? No? What kind of story, then, am I telling you? A legend, yes; and if I love to tell any sort of tales, I love to tell these legends about things that never happened.

And so the summer passed, and the last rose of summer had faded and gone; and the Benedictine monk sadly reflected that he had no flower to crown the holy image with. But when the Abbot of the monastery saw his sadness, and asked questions, and found the cause of his sorrow, the father Abbot bade the young monk say the "Hail Mary," twenty-five times each day, for Our Lady would think as highly of the prayer without the flowers as with the flowers, since the garden had no blossoms for any wreaths. Then the monk said his twenty-five "Aves" with a loving heart, and look! a crown of roses, red and splendid, adorns the head of Mary.

Such is my customary way in dealing with legends, and, in adopting it, I am conscious of no dilemma. If, however, I taught the same children day after day, or from Sunday to Sunday, I should reduce the cautionary note to a barely perceptible minimum. Children soon become familiar with a teacher's spiritual attitude, and can more and more dispense with formal intimations. After a time, it might suffice if one began a narrative thus:—

Once upon a time, it happened . . . if it ever happened at all! . . .

Even that parenthesis of scepticism might disappear, and the teacher could recite the legendary miracle with just a whimsical smile, as if saying with Horace, "Let the Hebrew believe it!" But, in approaching the central conception of the story, in approaching, for instance, the point where the Benedictine monk is affectionately and devoutly proving that his heart marches without the aid of external and material adjuncts, the teacher should speak with conviction, as one who was eliciting truth out of metaphor, and a noble message out of a play of fancy. If he does that well, it will not be necessary for him to end up with the dreary and Philistine formula, "This story, children, teaches us," &c. If I were general of an army of moral instructors I should be inclined to court-martial any teacher who was found guilty of persecuting young people with a five-minutes' peroration about "what we may learn from the foregoing narrative." An appropriate punishment for the wretch would be to make him attend a performance of a play by Shakespeare, or Ibsen, or Maeterlinck, and, at the fall of the curtain, stay an hour longer while a pompous professor deduced fifteen or twenty platitudinous morals from the drama he had just witnessed; and eating nuts or chocolate during this operation would be rigidly forbidden.

One other point may be considered, and that is the question as to what is to be done when a young child, after accepting Santa Claus, and fairy-tales and legends without demur, suddenly asks, "Mother (or teacher) is it true?" Of course, I am supposing that the elder person has not followed the method of suggesting incidental doubt, such as I have already sketched. Here you have a really dramatic situation. The new generation, as it were, arises face to face with the old, and delivers its challenge. Progress pleads against order, and love must solve the difficulty. And love takes the form of reverence. The greatest reverence, said the Latin sage, is due to the child. We must reverence the spirit of inquiry, and respect the young questioner's doubt. Quite candidly, but with genial humour (so as to avoid the air of being "found out"), we must admit that, after all, we were interested in a significance rather than an actual history, and took pleasure in a charming fiction because it warmed the heart and expanded the sympathy. Nevertheless, we can freely invite the child to treasure the pretty tale—now discovered to be only a dainty vehicle—and even recite it to other little ears. In my judgment, however, it is wiser not to let this situation emerge at all. It is wiser to insert the gentle note of caution at a quite early stage, and, by carefully stressing the ethical and religious meaning as against the lesser value of the "facts," obviate the embarrassment of having to answer the impeachment "Is it true?"

F. J. GOULD

EGOIST OR ALTRUIST?

How shall the necessary and fundamental self adjust its habits to the other than self which forms the higher type of character? The fact that the self is the only field on which its better modes of being may be produced is asserted by statement and implication in poets and philosophers alike. Indeed, poets have some claim to chief regard if the imaginative rather than the analytic faculty be the elevating lever—

"Your Fouriers failed

Because not poets enough to understand
That life develops from within."

Whatever is true of altruism as the finer principle of personal progress, it seems also true that egoism has first to be realised. The first person singular has to be a big "I." A little i presents no adequate motive for development.

"The baby new to earth and sky . . .
Has never thought that 'This is I.'
But, as he grows he gathers much
And learns the use of 'I' and 'me,'
And finds 'I am not what I see
And other than the things I touch.'
So rounds he to a separate mind . . .
His isolation grows defined."

Common observation perceives that in normal progress the value of "I" increases first. In youth it is, "I have to find a place," "I have to get on," "I have to choose a mate," "I have to enlarge my powers." To nothing do we extend a readier charity than to the self-assertion of the youth who is growing in personal powers or in position. Vitality has no better field than self-consciousness. Till this field is occupied the need of a wider and better direction of mind is not realised.

"In man there's failure only since he left
The lower and unconscious forms of life,
. . . the rendering plain Man's spirit might grow conscious of man's life,
And by new lore so added to the old Take each step higher over the brute's head."

Leaving "the unconscious forms of life," growing self-conscious, it is all laying a foundation in egoism for whatever better form of life may ultimately occupy the field of consciousness. Without myself I can be nothing.

Neither can I come to my highest power by sealing myself up in myself. The stores I collect are common human property, and I must use them for the general good.

A couple of examples will serve to exhibit the operation of the egoistic principle.

First we go to Bernard Shaw's "Man and Superman," and rub up against his free-thinker, so-called, who poses as a fellow who delights to play ducks and drakes with conventional types of morality in the persons of friends who cannot shake him off but are shocked by him. This Tanner first says to his warm, simple, middle-class companion, in the presence of a solid, stately, middle-aged representative of the reputable type, "My dear Tavy, your pious English habit of regarding the world as a moral gymnasium, built expressly to strengthen your own character in, occasionally leads you to think about your own confounded principles when you should be thinking about other people's necessities"; meaning that Tavy ought rather to compromise himself than coddle himself. But whatever Tanner may tell Tavy about his "confounded principles," he very soon confesses to Ann that he had in early days "played the boy buccaneer with no more conscience than a fox in a poultry farm," but that he came "to have scruples, to feel obligations, to find that veracity and honour were no longer goody-goody expressions in the mouths of grown-up people, but compelling principles in myself." Ann shrewdly replies, "I suppose you were beginning to be a man." His delight in shocking conventional moralists left him a bond-slave to the same conventional morality in the core of his own being. This fact is wholly independent of the way it came about, whether it came by some native instinct or by a process of judgment such as Robert Browning outlines when he says:

"A soul has seen
By means of evil that good is best."

Tanner has seen it, and it is enough to start with; it adds the one touch of principle to Tanner himself.

Another example comes from the other extreme of types of men, from the egoistic beginnings of earnest life as portrayed in Southey's life of John Wesley. For when John Wesley was pressed by his father and brother to accept the cure of souls at Epworth, he "made it an affair of religious casuistry and argued as if his own salvation would be impossible at Epworth . . . the cares of the world would roll back with a full tide upon him. Uninterrupted freedom from trifling acquaintance was necessary for him. . . He stood in need of persons nearly of his own judgment and engaged in the same studies; persons who were awakened into a full and lively conviction that they had only one work to do upon earth; who had devoted themselves absolutely to God; who would take up their cross daily; who would constantly watch over his soul, . . . and this was a blessing which he could enjoy nowhere but at Oxford." At this period of John Wesley's growth Tanner would undoubtedly have said he thought more about his "confounded principles" than the necessities of the two thousand people of Epworth. And his father and brother seemed of the same opinion as Tanner. It is nothing new for the best of men to be misunderstood.

The singular coincidence, however, of the unorthodox man with the serious theologian on the mode of moral development is something to note. Tanner blames an ordinary upright gentleman for caring more about his own principles than about other peoples' necessities. He did not go so far as to say that if good men cared enough for other people their principles would care for themselves. But he came into close agreement with the fine-souled author of "The Galilean Philosophy," who after defining "Love, as distinguished from Selfness," as "regard for the universal," goes on to the further proposition, "unless the state of Selfness be exchanged for Love all individual and Social perfection are impossible."

We come, therefore, to a slightly complex position. In the first instance, we cultivate on the field of self-consciousness "compelling principles" that are goody-goody in the best sense and are anything but goody-goody in a low sense, and that are cherished expressly and mainly to determine our own conduct; principles, however, which are egoistic to us in their scope. In the next step, having our own ground firm, we exchange this egoistic standpoint for the universal standpoint of Love. "We rise by things that are under our feet," to altruism.

"He's true to God who's true to man;
wherever wrong is done,
To the humblest and the weakest, 'neath
the all-beholding sun,
That wrong is also done to us, and they are slaves most base Whose love of right is for themselves and not for all their race."

Are we in the middle of one of the antinomies on which Mr. Baring Gould says much?—those laws of the inner life that balance each other? It may seem a queer tangle that we should have to develop self to its highest power of apprehending and appropriating vast principles only to dissolve oneself in a sense of the universal need and the universal claims—that, in fine, the highest egoism passes into altruism. It is on a par with those deep sayings of the spiritual life, that to love life is to lose it, that mourning should be the entrance into blessedness, that poorness of spirit should be the path to empire. But the solution of apparent contradictions is in experience. One hour on the higher planes of life closes all open questions.

Christine Rossetti has a sparkling little poem entitled, "Who shall deliver me?" In it she gives rhythmic form to this apparent conflict between egoism and altruism, and ranges her belief in rank with the author of "The Galilean Philosophy":—

"All others are outside myself;
I lock my door and bar them out,
The turmoil, tedium, gad-about.
I lock my door upon myself
And bar them out."

Instantly, however, she has got herself into personal solitude of soul she takes one piercing glimpse through "the open windows of the soul," and sees herself imprisoned in selfness, and the spring glory of a better life on the fields of wider scope:—

"But who shall wall Self from myself, most loathed of all?"

If I could once lay down myself
And start self-purged upon the race
That all must run! . . .

If I could set aside myself,
And start with lightened heart upon
The road by all men overgone!
God harden me against myself."

The conclusion is that the more one apprehends the significance of oneself the more is one fitted to apprehend the significance of other selves of like kind. And then we needs must love the highest when we see it, and confess—

"Yet One there is can curb myself,
Can roll the strangling load from me,
Break off the yoke and set me free."

And if John Wesley did begin by locking the door upon himself it was not long before he broke the lock and came forth to be the heart and soul of the powerful evangelical revival.

ALPINE COLOUR.

ENGLISH people, says a recent writer, have come to think more of fine weather than they did. It seems that this is true, at least of town-dwellers. In the large towns the contemporary mood is sun-worshipping; we have grown impatient of colourlessness, jealous of our share in the world's heritage of sunshine, less disposed to ignore a depressing outside world because we can stir the fire and pull the curtains. Presumably the English climate has not changed. It is we who have changed—we who rush in our increasing thousands to open-air life and sunlit climes and purposeful pilgrimages of following the sun. We come back contemptuous of the very transient disclosures of climatic beauties permitted by our conditions. A Yoshio Markino rejoices his less accustomed eyes in our misty greys and opaline silvers, in our sombre drabs and browns delicately suggesting shadowy Northern emotions. We have visions of turquoise skies and ultramarine seas, of the magic irradiation of lands where the sunshine is tangible and sovereign. Muted strings cease to please us, we begin to want the clash of the full orchestra. Our new music and our new awareness of sun and colour seem to go together. In the eager exploiting of life which marks our new world we cannot afford to miss any of the effect. Perhaps it is all verging a little on the Rococo, missing the beauty that hides in reticence, and restraint, and neutral shades. But at least it is life; and "O," we cry with Keats, "for a life of sensations!"

To this mood, this craving for colour and the sun in dingy towns, such books as Mr. Flemwell's new volume* come like a call out of prison into the light. Every page and every picture in it flash with sunlight. Ostensibly it is a plea for an extension in this country of Alpine gardening, an invitation to reproduce in English parks and estates "stretches of meadowland sown or planted with Alpine field-flowers." This is a proposition which chiefly concerns the minority of wealthy enthusiasts who can afford to make experiments on a large scale. Really Mr. Flemwell's book is addressed to all and sundry who have fallen under the glamour of long, warm, polychrome, lustrous days, with their vivid and exuberant pleasures of life in the open air.

Whether we shall ever see the Swiss meadows, in which May and June and early July revel so glowingly and so lavishly, imitated in England is open to doubt. But that matters little. Possibly the new enthusiasm for colour may accomplish even that. For the few who read as gardeners the many will read a book which is a poetic embodiment, by pen and brush, of magic memories of Switzerland, a crystallisation of those very harmonies they have heard before and long to hear again. They only need to open the book at any page or picture, and the monody of grey skies changes into a symphony of lucent atmospheres; the neutral tints composed of mist or fog and grime blush into the rosy splendour of the rhododendron hill-slope, deepen into the "heaven-reflected blue" of the haunt of the vernal gentian, change and tremble into the soft sheen of the crocus-starred meadow. The whole procession of the flower carnival goes triumphantly by, climbing up and up till it clings about the feet of the glaciers—where, especially, Mr. Flemwell catches up with it and fixes it in bewitching display.

The author is full of poetic fancies about the flowers he shows us. He holds the balance fairly evenly between the voluptuous and ascetic beauties, but it would seem that his true lover's idealism plays most, after all, about the white. He has a curious affinity for white forms, and speculates pleasantly concerning the subtle influences of colour in flowers. And what a dainty glimpse of the "Paradise Lily" he gives us, both in detail, and in massed foreground to the white glitter of the Glacier de Trient! Truly, Mr. Flemwell both writes and paints as a mystic who peers at all hours and seasons into Nature's soul. The mysticism is suggested rather than expressed; we only read it between the lines full of practical information and exact knowledge, and the final impression he leaves, as becomes a painter, is that of beauty. Nevertheless, we feel that, like Wordsworth, he is seeking the souls of lonely places, and whether he captures the daffodil light, or the sunset glow, or the jewelled Apollo butterfly, or the loveliness of the flower-field, it is always with that sense of "something illimitable" over and above the sensuous charm which gives value and significance to it all.

THE REAL SOURCE OF POWER IN PREACHING.

SIR,—I do not wish to turn a friendly interchange of views into a controversy, and if I write further on this subject it is simply to suggest to Dr. Tayler that it would be somewhat difficult to find sufficient in common between the four poets he mentions—Milton, Shelley, Browning and Wordsworth—to enable one to understand from a survey of their personalities what are the things that are essential to the making of a poet. That which unites them in a group is simply and solely that they were poets, just as Parker, Campbell, Collyer and Phillips Brooks are united in another group by being preachers.

I understand now, however, from the concluding sentences of Dr. Tayler's further letter that his object in raising the discussion was really to ascertain whether the training of the preacher should not be different from that of the minister. This is an interesting point, and worthy of consideration by those in whose hands lies the training of men for the work of the churches. Personally, however, I doubt whether much could be done by organised outward training to help the preacher, for the great preacher, like any other great artist, is mainly concerned in the interpretation of the things that his own soul hath seen and felt. He may be helped to speak effectively, to reason convincingly, and so on, but the real source of power in preaching would seem to lie in the personality of the preacher, and particularly in the emotional side of that personality. It is worthy of note, too, that an astonishing proportion of the great preachers have had but little, if any, definite pulpit training.—Yours, &c.,

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE Rev. Jas. Harwood, Secretary of the National Conference, writes as follows: "May I be allowed, through your columns, to remind our friends that the Triennial Meetings of this Conference are to be held in Birmingham next April (16-19)? The arrangements are well in hand, and invitations, with full particulars, will be sent out in a few weeks. But as some congregations hold their annual meetings and the committees of some district associations hold their quarterly meetings in January, it may be convenient for them to appoint delegates in advance of their invitations. Each congregation on the roll has now the right to appoint two delegates, though hospitality can be afforded to one only."

A FRENCH VIEW OF ENGLAND.

Modern England. By Louis Cazamian. London: J. M. Dent & Sons. 4s. 6d. net.

THERE never was an age in which the need for intelligent thinking on the condition and conditions of the great entity called England was so imperative as it is to-day. But so vast is the complexity of the world of facts in which we live, so appallingly immense the problem of our national (and also our "Imperial") existence, so elaborate the forces which have driven and are driving us to whatever goal is our destiny, that modern English literature hardly does more than treat in more or less exhaustive analysis one or other aspect of this question. A Frenchman has now essayed, however, in a moderately sized and very readable volume, excellently translated, a comprehensive historical and social study of Modern England, meaning by that term the focus of moral and physical activity which is the heart of the British Empire.

Given first in his professorial capacity at the Sorbonne, the matter contained in this book has been re-arranged by M. Cazamian for English readers. The result is a veritable tour de force of insight into the implications of what the author himself calls "a foreign country," a foreign literature, and a separate development. We sometimes declare, with pride in our insularity, that nobody but an Englishman can understand an Englishman or England. M. Cazamian penetrates into the heart of that fortified territory, dips into our secret knowledge about ourselves, reads life in our terms, and states our view of the universe for us with a plain speaking that is almost embarrassing, so entirely without mere "clothes" does he leave us. But he is completely detached, and dispassionate, and as unemotional as a biologist examining cells. He nothing extenuates nor sets down aught in malice. Indeed, he is not primarily concerned with commenting on us as we are, but with showing how we have come to be that, and inquiring what we are going to do about it now. It is not that he relates the facts so much as he tries to "trace the main lines along which they can best be grouped." For while, he declares, England's adaptation and development have been traditionally instinctive rather than consciously reasoned, the demands of the last hundred years, the general conditions of economic, social and moral life, transformed universally as they are, now force the vital instinct of England into transformation also; she is forced into rational, conscious adaptation to the exigencies of modern life. "In that atmosphere," says M. Cazamian, "the national type itself is modified; infected with the nervousness and restlessness of modern life, the Englishman of to-day has grown less unlike his Continental neighbour. At the same time, thinkers and politicians proclaim the necessity for England of becoming more conscious of herself, more intelligent and learned; and through religion, daily life, hygiene, manners, a new spirit is diffused, a universal pragmatism, eagerly watching the social and practical consequences of both notions and acts. Contemporary England is striving to achieve intelligent efficiency." In a word, conscious effort is taking the place of empiricism in English methods.

With a precise lucidity characteristically French, the author makes us realise that actuality of national experience from 1832 which has resulted in modern England. With certain generalisations we may not be in agreement; but taken as a whole this "foreign" sketch of those strenuous English years is so far as our judgment goes unique. Most crucially interesting is the latter half of the book. It holds up the mirror to an England which can hardly recognise her own reflection. The symbol of an apoplectic John Bull does not serve. For the impression she is making on the European mind is of a country anxious about its efficiency and its vitality, conscious of imperilment by foreign competition, awakened from the optimism which once saw in England the best of all possible worlds, challenged by the increase of the German Navy, forced out of a "splendid isolation" into a combative Imperialism, and confronted with a dissolution of values which John Bull comfortably typified—property, the family, marriage, patriotism, the established religion, morals—and an uncompromising criticism of all her time-honoured mysteries and conventions sounding from end to end of the English-speaking world in the stinging paradoxes of such writers as Bernard Shaw. An Empire, after having slowly and unconsciously developed, is now anxiously interrogating and organising itself. How will she emerge, or will she emerge at all, into the era of intense and scientific civilisation into which mankind is rushing? M. Caxamian does not end on an interrogation. He believes in England's will to live. But to the searching and clear-sighted questions which he puts we must sooner or later find a definite answer.

CHATTERTON.

The Rowley Poems. By Thomas Chatterton. Reprinted from Tyrwhitt's Third Edition. Edited, with an Introduction, by Maurice Evan Hare. Clarendon Press, Oxford. Pp. xlv, xxvii, 333. 5s. net.

THE volume under our notice purports to be no more than a reprint of Tyrwhitt's third edition of the Rowley Poems, edited and introduced to the general reader by Mr. M. E. Hare. As such it is an interesting addition to the shelves of the book lover. But it is more. We recognise in it a valuable contribution to what we are happy to believe is the growing appreciation of the genius of Chatterton—

"The marvellous Boy,
The sleepless Soul that perished in his pride."

Masson, Russell, and Ingram in their biographical appreciations have done not a little to keep the poet's memory green, but their books are overweighted with preconceptions and personal theories; and Dr. Wilson's study—easily the best book written on our subject—has long gone beyond the reach of the second-hand dealer. It has been left to Mr. Hare to present, in the briefest space, the best and most illuminative notice of Chatterton's life and work that is likely to find a public to-day. His biographical sketch covers all the points necessary for his reader's primary impression of the poet. His consideration of the value of the Rowley Poems produces judgments which aid their critical examination, and of these no reader who has himself covered the ground carefully will dispute the validity and positively refreshing common-sense of the following:—"However absurd from any historical point of view the language and metres of the boy poet may be, at least he invented a practical language which admirably conveyed his impression of the latest period of the middle ages—that after-glow which began with the death of Chaucer." His critical bibliography is precisely the thing that has long been wanted in studies of Chatterton. Save for a lapse or two, it surveys the field of discussion from Tyrwhitt's first edition (1777); and it is, in our judgment, a fair commentary on the various contributions. A few pages are given to additional notes, and a synopsis of the arguments used in the Rowley controversy.

If we have a lance to break with Mr. Hare, it is because he fails in his general view fully to recognise the inventive genius of Chatterton as it set itself deliberately, not unconsciously, to the imitation of the several poets of his intimate literary acquaintance. For the rest, we have only praise for his book, and trust it will be followed by a volume comprising the undisputed poems and the miscellanies in prose and verse.

The Sunday School Quarterly for January contains some excellent articles, including one on "The Sunday School and Citizenship," by the Rev. A. Ernest Parry, emphasising the importance of training girls and boys in the duties of the citizen, which "embraces and connotes and demands almost every other quality that is fine and desirable in human character and conduct." Perhaps there has never been a time when the need of good citizens has been as great as it is to-day, and every advantage ought to be taken of the opportunity given to Sunday school teachers of holding up before their pupils those ideals and aspirations which will lead them later on to regard the rendering of some service to the community as one of their chief aims in life. A sermon on "The Sense of Obligation," by Dr. Gordon, of the New Old South Church, Boston, U.S.A., which was preached in the Chapel at Harvard, expands the idea of the moral and social obligations of the individual, and forces us back imperatively to the word "ought," with its Puritan severity and insistence on positive duties. The Rev. Charles Roper gives an interesting account of the way in which he has built up his Sunday school at Kilburn—a remarkable piece of work to be accomplished in so short a time, although he confesses that he and his fellow-workers are still in the experimental stage, and have not yet stereotyped themselves "into a rigid method, good or bad." A paper on "Discipline" is contributed by Miss Mary Francis; Dr. Tudor Jones, the Rev. T. M. Falconer, and Mr. F. J. Gould are responsible for the "Notes for Teachers," Bible readings and lessons for 1912; and there are also contributions by Mr. J. Lonsdale Cox, the Rev. Albert Thornhill, Dr. Lionel Tayler, and others.

LITERARY NOTES.

"CARDINAL NEWMAN'S LIFE," by Mr. Wilfrid Ward, will be issued by Messrs. Longmans & Co., on January 22, in two volumes. The work is based on the Cardinal's private journals and correspondence.

* * *

DEAN INGE'S Four Lectures recently delivered by him at Sion College to the Women's Diocesan Association, which attracted considerable attention at the time, are to be published immediately by Messrs. Longmans & Co. The title will be "The Church and the Age."

A NEW book by Sir George Trevelyan will be published by Messrs. Longmans & Co. during the present month. The title is "George the Third and Charles Fox": the concluding part of "The American Revolution." The work will be completed in two volumes, but the first volume only will be published now. The following is the author's account of the book as told in the preface:—

"The Early History of Charles James Fox" was published 31 years ago, in October, 1880. In the following December I accepted office as Secretary of the Admiralty, and perforce abandoned literature for an indefinite period to come. At the beginning of the next Session, in the lobby of the House of Commons, Mr. Justin McCarthy did me the honour to express a wish that there existed a Statutory power for obtaining an Order of Court to compel me 'to finish Fox'; and I am very glad to think that my old friend is alive to read this book. Its two volumes—of which the first is here, and the second is already more than half written—will carry Fox up to the moment which, so far as personal success was concerned, proved to be the culminating point of his whole career. They will likewise include, and complete, 'The History of the American Revolution'—my tranquil and pleasant occupation during the later years of a life much of which was passed in stormier waters."

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Quest, January, 1912.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

JOHN AND THEODORE.

FIRST of all, John.

He saw the nest of a robin in a tree, and the mother-robin sitting over it. The order of his ideas was this. Robin: stone. So he picked up a stone. Steady his eye; careful his aim; he threw: the robin fell dead.

In the boy's heart—joy!

John stood still, and thought. The dead bird looked a poor, wretched heap of feathers and waste. Some young robins waited in the nest for food which would never come. They would wait, and starve. John Woolman kept thinking about them until he grieved.

In the boy's heart—pain.

What was to be done? He thought of a plan, though it made his heart ache to carry it out. He climbed the tree, and killed all the innocents. They would not starve now.

Never again would the boy kill an animal in sport.

This American lad with the tender heart grew up a sturdy man, who cared for men as well as man's animal friends. The men—and women and children—that most cried out for care and mercy in those days were negroes. When John was about 25 years of age he had to copy for his employer a paper—a bill of sale—which set out the name and price of a coloured woman. The purchaser waited while the bill was written. The negress also waited, and was then borne away to a new slavery.

"Never again," said the young man, "will I put my hand to any writing that sends into slavery a fellow-creature of mine."

As he kept his vow about the robin, so he kept it about the negro-slaves. More than that, he lifted up his voice as a preacher against the evil of slavery. John was a member of the Society of Friends; he was a Quaker; and in his eyes shone the sacred light of a soul that lived for the service of the Highest, and therefore he served the Black Man as well as the White. The Quakers gave heed to his prayer; for he often visited at Quaker houses, and often left silver with the masters, saying, "Give this money as a gift to your slaves." His kind acts and his kind pleading touched the hearts of slave-holding Friends, and some set their slaves free. In 1758, at the city of Philadelphia, a meeting of Friends declared that it would be well if every Quaker would cease to own slaves. In 1776, at Philadelphia again, the Quakers said no man or woman should belong to their Society who owned a slave; and thus the Quakers led the way for the freedom of the coloured people in America. But by that time John Woolman had been four years dead. He had journeyed to England, and he died at York. There is at York a very noble Minster, where I have sat with delight under the "high embowèd roof," in the shadow of the tall pillars; but I think nothing nobler than John Woolman ever entered within the walls of York. The noble boy became a noble man.

Next, Theodore.

Into a school where white boys learned lessons at Connecticut, U.S.A., there came one day a negro child. A six-year-old boy, named Theodore, was much struck at the sight of him, for he had never seen a black boy before.

The new boy had to sit on a seat at a distance from the others. Neither at work nor play was he treated as a school-mate. He said his lessons to the teacher by himself. Not seldom the teacher jeered at his mistakes, and sent him back to his bench, his cheek tingling from a blow.

Nobody cared except Theodore.

After a day or two, Theodore Weld (such was his name) spoke to the teacher—

"May I change my seat?"

"Where do you wish to sit?"

"Next to Jerry."

Jerry was the black scholar.

The teacher laughed. All the white boys, except Theodore, laughed. Jerry watched eagerly. Could it be true that he had a white boy friend?

"So you are a nigger too?" chuckled the teacher.

All the white scholars, except Theodore, laughed again.

Theodore's wish was granted. The white boy and the African sat on one bench. Together they bent their heads over their books. Together they said their lessons to the teacher. Together they played. Together they bore the scorn of the school. That first day Theodore's little bosom was all in tumult. It was a hard thing to be pointed at and laughed at. But the days passed, and the white boys took less notice.

Years afterwards (about 1840), among the men who went up and down the United States saying slavery must be ended, one of the bravest and most earnest was Theodore D. Weld. He and his fellow-workers in that cause were known as Abolitionists. When once he told the story which I have just told you, he added—

"I have been an Abolitionist ever since."

Ever since. The boy had remained faithful to the good ideal of freedom which he had first understood at the Connecticut school.

It is certainly worth while being a boy when you can become a man such as John or Theodore.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. FRANK EVERS.

WE regret to record the death, on January 3, of Mr. Frank Evers, at his residence, White Hall, Old Swinford, near Stourbridge. Although Mr. Evers would have been eighty-five if he had lived till August 31, until quite lately he was strong and vigorous physically, with an exceptionally alert mind, so that his death has come as a shock to his innumerable friends and acquaintances in the Midlands. He had been connected from his earliest youth with the ancient rural chapel at Cradley, known as Park-lane Chapel, Netherend, though for many years his residence has been near Stourbridge, with the Presbyterian (Unitarian) chapel of which town he was also associated. In addition to this, his help and sympathy were constantly and cordially extended to the neighbouring congregation at Lye, of which and of many Midland chapels, as well as Netherend and Stourbridge, he was a trustee, taking a very active part in their management. His early education was obtained at the famous school in Edgbaston kept by a former Netherend minister, the Rev. William Bowen, where he had as his schoolfellows, among other well-known Birmingham worthies, Sir Alfred Wills, till lately a Judge of the High Court, and the late Sir Thomas Martineau. Entering business with his father, an ardent Cradley Unitarian, who then resided at the Parsonage in Netherend, Mr. Evers, in conjunction with other members of the family, had very large manufacturing and colliery interests, as well as being connected with numerous commercial undertakings all over the Black Country. For many years, however, he had retired from business, and devoted himself to his magisterial and other duties, particularly those connected with philanthropic purposes. A warm lover of children, with a large family of his own, of whom six sons and one daughter survive; he was a tower of strength to the day schools attached to Netherend Chapel, the sale of which to the County Educational Authority he successfully consummated but a few years ago, after the Act of 1902. A very wide reader, especially in theology, and an acute thinker, Mr. Evers' views largely approximated to those of his old friend, the Rev. Charles Voysey, but he was very tolerant towards those whose minds were of a more conservative type, and enjoyed the friendship of men of all creeds, clerical and lay. The oldest member of the Netherend congregation, Mr. Evers was looked upon as its patriarch, and seldom missed a service, though coming a very long distance to chapel, till about a year ago when age began to tell upon him. What he was as a friend to successive ministers and their families it is difficult for the writer of this brief notice to describe adequately for personal reasons. Mr. Evers was a subscriber to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and to Manchester College, Oxford, and was a former Vice-President of the Ministers' Benevolent Society, as well as a generous supporter of his own and other Midland chapels. He was one of the oldest magistrates for Worcestershire and Staffordshire.

The funeral service was conducted on January 6, in the presence of a large number of old friends, including a considerable contingent from the Netherend and Stourbridge congregations, by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, of Netherend, his own minister, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Ewart, of Stourbridge, at the Stourbridge Unitarian Chapel.

A special memorial service, conducted by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, was held last Sunday at the Netherend Chapel, when there was a large congregation of old workmen and friends.

MR. THOMAS ATKINS.

THE congregation worshipping at the Great Meeting, Hinckley, has sustained another heavy loss through the death of Mr. Thomas Atkins, of Hollycroft House, who passed away on the last day of 1911, in the 80th year of his age. Mr. Atkins was the only surviving member of a family whose influence in the town of their birth has always been exerted in beneficent ways. With two of his brothers, one of whom died at an early age, he was associated with the staple industry of Hinckley, and contributed much by his ability to a commercial success which has redounded to the good of the whole community. He was of a kind and generous nature, ever ready to help the suffering and needy. Nothing that made for the welfare of the town, mental, moral, or material, failed to secure his interest and support, and in all he did there was a complete absence of ostentation. From earliest childhood Mr. Atkins was connected with the Great Meeting Chapel. During a dark passage in its history, when its life almost flickered out, it was largely due to his loyalty and that of other members of the family that the Chapel was kept open for worship and its pulpit supplied with a message, and for the congregational success and prosperity which is now enjoyed he must be counted responsible in no small degree. He was a generous subscriber to the funds of the Chapel, a regular worshipper until the encroachments of age made themselves too severely felt, and a real friend of ministers, many of whom will be reminded by his death of the pleasant hospitality received under his roof. Mr. Atkins leaves a widow and one son. The funeral took place on Wednesday, January 3, being preceded by a service in the chapel. The Rev. J. T. Jenkins, pastor of the Great Meeting, officiated, and a former minister, the Rev. W. G. Price, of Hale, Cheshire, gave the address. Both at the Chapel and at the Cemetery where the burial took place there was a large gathering of sympathising friends and representatives of the employees, congregation, and others.

MRS. KATE GANNETT WELLS.

THE mural tablet in Arlington-street Church to the memory of Dr. Gannett records that "he laboured with untiring activity for the moral and social elevation of the community, and rendered important service in the formation and management of many associations designed to lessen the evils of poverty, ignorance, and sin." What is there said of the father is scarcely less true of the daughter whose lifeless form has just been laid by his side, forty years after his death. Much has already been written and said about the various ways in which her influence for good has been felt; but only a part of what she did, both before and after her father's death, has been even hinted at. When those who have known her longest and best try to recall her various activities, few can fail to be surprised at the extent and variety of the good works which she devised or promoted. Of them nothing needs to be said here, for most, if not all, of them will be speedily recognised elsewhere, and nothing needs to be said of that happy faculty which enabled her also to see the humorous side of things often taken too seriously.

But along with her large-minded and large-hearted public service there went an equal devotion to her father's church and a personal interest in his parishioners, as well as an affection for the friends of her earlier and her later years, which can never have been surpassed and seldom have been equalled. Deprived of a mother's care when a mere child, and not long afterward of the companionship of one aunt and at a later period of the advice of another aunt for whom she was named, she quietly took up the duties of a minister's wife, as soon as she was old enough to do so. She became, as it were, the lady of the parish while continuing to be its daughter, but only to relinquish the position just as gracefully when, one after another, a new minister's wife came into the church. She filled a place during all this time which would otherwise have been unprovided for, but she never overstepped the proper limits of time and place. She never forgot one of her father's old parishioners—now a rapidly diminishing number—and never neglected a duty he would have wished her to perform. In looking back over the long life of Mrs. Wells one is most of all impressed by her many-sided character which brought her in touch with such diverse interests, and by her absolute fidelity in all the relations which they involved, whether of public service or of personal friendship.

C. C. S.

Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells died suddenly December 13 after an illness of brief duration. She attended service at Arlington-street Church on Sunday, as was her custom, and her condition was not thought to be serious until the day before her death, which was peaceful and without any suffering. Her last published literary work was an historical review of "Fifty Years of the Arlington-street Church," in the Transcript of Saturday, December 9, which recounted in her delightful style the events of earlier days of that parish.

Mrs. Wells was born in England about sixty-six years ago, and was the daughter of the late Rev. Ezra Stiles Gannett, D.D., minister of the Arlington-street Church, where he succeeded Dr. Channing. He was a grandson of President Ezra Stiles, of Yale, but was himself a graduate of Harvard, where he subsequently served as overseer.

Mrs. Wells did much literary and public work. She was long a member of the Massachusetts State Board of Education and served almost three terms of eight years each. She was also deeply interested in the work of the Normal Art School and was identified with its growth and development. She was Chairman of the Board of Visitors at the Art School for ten years and was an honorary member of the Alumni Association. She was also Chairman of the Board of Visitors to the Framingham Normal School, where Wells Hall, built in 1902, was named by the State Board of Education in honour of her. She was a member of a similar board at the Hyannis Normal School, where, thirteen years ago, she was especially active.

Mr. Edwin D. Mead has said of her:—

"Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells has been during the whole period of my own life in Boston one of the noblest and most useful women in the city, one of the most conspicuous and devoted in good works. She was a public possession, and we are all her debtors for manifold and indefatigable public service."

The following additional tribute to the memory of Mrs. Wells by Emily A. Fifield appeared in the Christian Register on December 28, and will doubtless be of interest to our readers:—

To the many appreciative articles written in memory of Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, I wish to add a personal word of affectionate remembrance. There are many who have known the welcome of her hospitable home in Boston, and some have visited beautiful Campobello, the place so dear to her and where I have had the privilege of knowing her most intimately.

Here were spent some of her happiest days. In the retirement of home, but with the interest and activities of a large summer resort near at hand, Mrs. Wells was the Lady Paramount of all the place. She welcomed from year to year the returning cottagers and constantly devised ways of interesting the hotel guests. To the refined and cultivated influence of Mrs. Wells was largely due the unique character which for many years Campobello sustained.

Every islander will miss her, for, as the late Queen Victoria was known in the lovely Highland homes, so Mrs. Wells was known and loved and consulted on every subject. Every year she did something for the island. A boat landing was provided, a new road or path was carried through, trees were preserved or a bit of beach improved. The success of the library, for which she did so much, was one of her greatest satisfactions and pleasures. No one will miss her more than old Tomar, the picturesque Indian who was devoted to her service. It even seemed that the animals and flowers knew her and looked up to her.

Mrs. Wells was truly a "thorn bearer" as regards her deafness, but in the retirement of the island it seemed less of a disability to her, and no one ever managed such an infirmity better. This side of her life was little known to those who only saw Mrs. Wells hurrying across the Common to the State House.

As she passes on, they tell me, the West

Quaddy Light seems to close its eye for a longer interval and the strange figure of the Old Stone Friar sinks into a deeper shadow.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE LATE REV. SILAS FARRINGTON.

Memorial Service.

A LARGE congregation of friends in Richmond, and members of the various London Unitarian churches, met at the Richmond Free Church on Saturday, January 6, when a service was held in memory of the Rev. Silas Farrington, who was minister of the church from October, 1889, to October, 1904. The Rev. H. Gow, of Hampstead, assisted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, conducted the service. Mr. Gow's address was as follows:—

We gather together here to thank God for a quiet, strong, noble life, and to say for a little time farewell.

Reverently and lovingly we remember to-day the friend for whom God's swift and sudden call has come. It is not the desire to praise him, but the instinct of love and sorrow which brings us here to-day in this chapel which owes so much to him, and where he ministered so faithfully. We cannot stand beside the far-off grave: we could not gather round when his body was committed to the earth. And so we meet together here in this place, consecrated by many memories of his work; this building which owes so much of its origin to him, where he and his wife laboured so faithfully and quietly, and to which, although no longer young, he gave so much energy and thought. We remember, also, that other church in Manchester, where he ministered for nearly twenty years. Some of us, looking back upon our youth, recall what he did for us then, what he was to us after. There have been few ministers amongst us who have had such power over young men. It was not the power of emotional appeal, not the power of systematic thought. It was the power of a personality which we felt to be so simple, so true, so human, so interested in life, so wise and gentle in his judgments, so open-minded. I do not want to praise him overmuch. He was modest and retiring, and far from ambition and from thought of self. We must respect his modesty in speaking of him. But he would have been glad, I think, that we, his friends who loved him and who will always love him, should gather here, not to say very much about him, but to thank God for his life and work and to express a little of what we feel for him and what we owe to him. It is right and well that we should remind each other of his character, even if it must take the form of praise. His spirit was so sunny, so hopeful, so full of trust in man. He was not a violent reformer, not a dogmatic teacher. I could not give a reasoned account of his theology or of his social ideals. He saw something great and good in every honest creed and every earnest life. But it was not a mere gentle, universal approval, incapable of seeing falsity or wrong. Gentleness, tranquillity, peace were indeed essential qualities in all his life.

He was always kind, always ready to help, always the same in his sympathy and comprehension. There was no sense of effort in his kindness, no self-consciousness. But he united with his gentleness and benevolence a sense of humour, a delight in ideas, and a power to condemn the false as well as an intense admiration of the true, and a wide catholic sympathy above all creed and class and race. There are few men whose condemnation would have seemed to me so painful and so serious as his. He rarely condemned at all; he never condemned on conventional grounds, never on personal grounds. It could only be something which seemed to him really base that could call forth his indignation. We remember him as gentle, wise and strong, with unquestionable hope for humanity, finding pleasure and good in many small, almost unnoticeable things, living in an atmosphere of peace where harsh judgments, unkind thoughts, and weak complainings were unable to exist.

We remember thankfully the beauty and simplicity and quiet joy of the life which he and his wife lived in their country home, when he had retired from active work. Of none could it be said more truly—

"They also serve who only stand and wait."

There was still the same old interest in life and belief in life, the same ungrudging recognition of the work of others, the same delight in childhood and youth and in old friends, in nature, and in art and science.

We went to him for encouragement, and we always found encouragement and realised the worth of life. It was a beautiful old age, and when occasions came, as come they did, to tend the sick, to watch over the dying, to give a last touch of comfort to those who were very hard beset, the opportunity was taken with a joy and love which made it seem the most natural, easy, simple thing in all the world. Such deeds were natural to him and to his wife; we do not thank them, we rather feel through them the goodness and the love of God.

We think of a sympathy too deep for words of the darkened home where there was so true a companionship, so long and close an association, so beautiful a union. May God comfort the bereaved in their sorrow and loneliness! May the thought of the affection and gratitude and sorrow of so many friends be with them as a strength and consolation in their grief. May it be with no hopeless sorrow, but with a deep and solemn trust, that now for a little time we say farewell.

Sacred memories, which nothing can take away from us, are hidden in our hearts. Deeper than the sorrow is the joy in the love and goodness which was revealed to us. Through such memories we look forward to the life beyond with a stronger hope and confidence.

Following Mr. Gow, Mr. G. H. Edwards, a former secretary of the church and an intimate friend of Mr. Farrington for 22 years, gave an address. Though in point of time 22 years have gone, he said, yet, looking back, it does not seem so long since Mr. Farrington came to Richmond. It was in the autumn of 1889 that he came to Channing Hall, to the little congregation then twelve months old, bringing with him much of the wholesome vigour of the North, and something of the freshness of outlook of the New World that gave him birth.

So young he seemed physically, and so young-hearted too, that it seemed difficult to believe that he counted nearly sixty years. Restless under anything that appeared to fetter freedom, with the concurrence of the congregation he brushed aside the name of Unitarian Christian, with which the Church had begun its career, calling it simply "The Free Church," a designation much less widely used then than now. So soon as he had settled down, he began to build one lasting memorial to his name in the shape of this beautiful building, which, within a year of its opening in 1896, was completely freed from debt. This, as you all know, was largely due to the unceasing and self-sacrificing efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Farrington, with the warm support of another valued member of this congregation, who passed away not long ago—Lady Roscoe.

But enduring as this monument will, we trust, be, it is not so precious as that in the hearts of many, who have gone away to the ends of the earth, from Upper Brook-street in the North and from Richmond in the South, the scenes of Mr. Farrington's ministry in England. Many a choir boy, many a young man struggling to make a start in life, has found in Mr. Farrington an unobtrusive helper, and owes his place in the world to-day to his untiring patience in teaching, guiding, and launching him; and he was never happier than when taking a band of choir boys on some walk or excursion in the woods and fields he loved so well. Still, many years after, come their letters of affectionate remembrance from distant climes, telling of their progress and recalling those earlier days; and I believe I am right in saying that none of his correspondence gave Mr. Farrington more genuine pleasure.

In the notices which have appeared in the Christian Life and in THE INQUIRER, sympathetic reference has been made by old friends to the more striking features of his character—his single-mindedness; his capacity for standing alone when any question of principle was involved; his sunny and buoyant nature, which made intercourse with him a constant delight to his many friends. No one who had not known him closely and intimately could ever fully appreciate his nobility of character and his charm. A certain shyness made him difficult of access to a stranger. But to anyone he loved and who loved him there was revealed a nature strong and sweet, deeply sensitive, easily angered by anything mean or false; no saint, but a friend on whom one could rely with the certainty that he would give all he had to bestow—time, money, affection.

He was a curious combination of Puritan and Epicurean. His love of beauty demanded expression; his training and habit of thought, repression. In a recent letter from Cannes, he said: "It is so beautiful here, we are in danger of losing our simplicity. If we can only be good."

Strong-willed and single-minded, he often ploughed a lonely furrow, for his views did not always commend themselves. But he was never daunted, and went quietly on with his work.

The strongly-marked traits in his character brought him at times into collision with his fellow-workers, who did not always appreciate his genuine worth; but it has been a matter of profound astonishment to me that outside a few of his hearers at the Free Church, so few people in Richmond recognised the wonderful freshness and vitality of his teaching. In the North it had been different.

Easily pleased and easily depressed, though he never stayed long in the depths, he still kept the same unswerving course, continuing his work till at the age of 72 he determined that the time had come to pass it on to younger hands; but he never failed to take a lively interest in the welfare of his old congregation, or in those aspects of the religious life of London which most appealed to him. Always he had been frankly and touchingly dependent on his wife, leaning on her judgment even when it did not coincide with his own. Indeed they were so much one that it is difficult to think of one without the other. In this her hour of sorrow, our heartfelt sympathy goes out to the brave woman who has stood so faithfully by her husband's side for 56 years.

He kept his mental alertness, his youthful outlook, and his keen enjoyment of life to the last, and though at times the limitations upon his activity imposed by increasing years told heavily, for he was always longing to be up and doing as of old, still his buoyant spirits sustained him, and his kindly humour never failed.

Then came the end. He had dreaded the coming of winter; and when, before the dark days set in, friends came and carried him off to sunny Cannes, it was as a boy he went. His letters during those last two months bubble over with happiness. He enjoyed every moment till, on the very eve of his return home for Christmas, he sought one last glimpse of the beautiful moonlit bay, with the lights of the town twinkling below, and the great arms of the coast encircling all. He looked down and drank in the sheer beauty of the scene, and in a moment he had passed quietly away.

It was a fitting end to the life of one who had loved his fellow men and all things beautiful in nature; and one cannot grieve that while he was still able to enjoy life, in the midst of the scenes he loved best and without any sadness of farewell, he should have entered upon the new life, which is indeed only the old.

Gone into darkness, that full light
Of friendship! Pass'd in sleep away
By night into the deeper night!
The deeper night? A clearer day
Than our poor twilight dawn on earth.
If night, what barren toil to be!
What life so maimed by night were worth
Our living out? Not mine to me,
Remembering all the golden hours
Now silent and so many dead,
And him the last.

Miss A. Leigh Browne writes to us as follows:—

Amongst your readers who join in sorrow for the passing away of the Rev. Silas Farrington there must be many women who desire to record their gratitude for the encouragement he gave to women in the enlargement that is passing over their minds in regard to work as members of the community. On Citizen Sunday, October, 1895, Mr. Farrington preached at Richmond a sermon entitled "Women as Citizens." May I quote from it as a brief supplement to the addresses, full of grateful recollections, that were delivered at the memorial service on Saturday last?

Mr. Farrington said:—"We need the feeling to deepen and strengthen in the minds of all women that they have a part in this great common life, and duties to discharge in it; that they should feel themselves a part of the community, with interests, functions, obligations with regard to it; that they are citizens now in the deepest sense of that term, bound to promote the public good by their personal endeavours, and able to promote it. That is the meaning of all civic duty. It is never to let go this sense of being a member of the whole, of doing one's best to remedy its evils, to strengthen and enlarge its good. Depend upon it, much of our public work will be overlooked, half done, or not done at all, till women devote themselves to it and recognise it as theirs. The work needs women. May I add, women need the work! . . . Many among their fellow-labourers will respond to their call, as the children of Naphtali and Zebulun to the call of the ancient prophetess; as Barak did when he replied to her summons, 'If thou wilt go up with me, then will I go up, but if thou wilt not go with me, I will not go.' And she said, 'I will surely go with thee.'"

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE New Year greeting to teachers of the Sunday School Association by the President, the Rev. J. J. Wright, has special interest this year, coming, as it does, from one who is so well qualified to speak of the work of Sunday schools. It is as follows:—

My dear Fellow Teacher,—To be a good Member of Parliament, to say and do something in the House of Commons which, to the multitudes of men, women, and children outside, shall make it "easier to do right and more difficult to do wrong," is surely a high and honourable calling. And yet only the other day, within the precincts of the House itself, and in the presence of a large number of members thereof, gathered specially to meet and hear a prominent "Sunday school man," so successful a Parliamentarian as the Deputy Speaker, the Right Honourable J. H. Whitley, said: "It was often not well to make comparisons, but he had wondered sometimes, when in the midst of battles in the House, whether he was doing as good work as a Member of Parliament as he did as a Sunday school teacher; and whether the work of influencing a single boy was not of far greater value than a Member of Parliament was able to accomplish during many years."

Such a comparison, by such a man, and in such a place and company, may well encourage you and me, and might rightly raise the heart, and rouse the will, of every Sunday school teacher in our never-easy but forever needed work.

Let me remind you, once again, that we Sunday school teachers of this country alone—700,000 (seven hundred thousands) of us—are more in number than our British Army and Navy; and that, even now, we have more than 7,500,000 (seven and a half millions) of children and young people in our Sunday schools.

Yes, fellow-teacher, our work is as important and big as the work of Parliament; and we workers are as numerous as the Army and Navy,—whose work, alas, is often so different!

But see!—and this is the main point of my letter—are we 700,000 Sunday school teachers aiming in our own way to be as "fit" for our work as Army and Navy men (and nurses) are for theirs? Can we honestly say that we really do all that we can to "fit" ourselves for this task of endless good? More and more I am convinced that the success of Sunday school work nearly all turns on the teacher—that, is, on you and me! And never, since Sunday schools began, were more teachers trying—and trying successfully—to "fit" themselves for their unique work. I do hope, dear fellow-teacher, that you are one of these—and, if not, that you now will be; for, you see, if it needs "fitness" to do our ordinary daily work or to play our usual nightly or weekly game, it must need all the "fitness" we can acquire to mould or influence more than seven and a half millions of young lives.

My letter would get too long if I now went on to tell of ways to make ourselves "fit"; but the following ways I may, at least, mention. (1) Read for yourself, every season, one real good book on Sunday school work; (2) Talk as often as you can with your fellow teachers about teaching difficulties and possibilities; (3) Claim from your superintendent or minister a teachers' training class; (4) see that your school supplies you with all the books (for lesson or reference) published by the Sunday School Association, including The Sunday School Quarterly and Young Days; and (5) also see to it that your school sends not less than one teacher—yourself it may be—to our Oxford Summer School for Sunday School Teachers this year from June 28 to July 6.

May I end with a personal illustration? The teaching which any of us does is, at times, better or worse. We cannot always be even at our own best—or worst! This may be accounted for in various ways. I do not know how it may be with you, but, for myself, I always feel that I have been the most successful in teaching, whenever I have come, not merely face to face, but, life to life, with those I have taught—when I have felt that I was somehow wondrously helping a young life to be a life indeed, and to serve the Great Life in duty and in love. Have not you, at times, felt it so?

That this, or something better, may be your experience and reward during 1912 and longer, is the wish and prayer of,

Yours sincerely,

J. J. WRIGHT, President.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

A BRITISH EXPERIMENT IN LOCAL OPTION.

ADVOCATES of local option as regards the supply of licensed houses will be interested to hear the results of a poll which has taken place at Letchworth to decide whether the first garden city should have a public house on the estate. The proposal to have a licensed house was rejected by a majority of 596. The poll was interesting from several points of view, beside the main issue to be decided. All residents on the estate of six months' standing and over 25 years of age had a vote, so that the right of suffrage was as widely extended as the most democratically minded person could desire. 2,563 individuals had the necessary qualifications, women being in the majority; 1,638 voters went to the poll, 521 voting for and 1,117 against the proposed house. One would have expected that in a go-ahead place like Letchworth voters would have scorned to be conveyed to the poll, but it appears from the Press reports that the organisers of victory had the assistance of a number of carriages.

Letchworth has done without a public-house since its inception ten years ago, and it now appears that the majority of its inhabitants still desire to remain in that condition.

CO-OPERATION AMONG CHARITIES.

One of the most difficult tasks before the social worker at the present moment is to induce different agencies at work in a given district to co-operate, or at least to let each other know what they are doing. It is regrettable, but we fear true, that, broadly speaking, the least intelligent (and sometimes the most harmful) attempts at social amelioration are made under the auspices of religion. Many churches, and in some districts known to the present writer, at least one great religious organisation, flatly refuse to co-operate with other agencies, or even to discuss with them what they are doing. It need hardly be said that this is blind sectarianism in its worst form; and that, from the point of view of permanently valuable social work, it is pernicious in its effects on the neighbourhood. The principal agencies working for the welfare of London school children have recently issued an appeal to enable the Care Committees of the London elementary schools to establish boot clubs for poor children. We are glad to say that at the instance of the Children's Care Committee of the Social Welfare Association for London efforts are being made to co-ordinate the many different agencies which have the same object in view. Those who are at work among the London poor are only too painfully aware that great numbers of children in attendance at the elementary schools come barefooted or badly shod. Much has hitherto been done by teachers and private voluntary agencies, which, however, have not been able to cover the whole ground. The wisdom of putting the whole matter in charge of the Care Committees consists in the fact that they will be in touch with all school children, that overlapping and cadging will be prevented, and that close supervision of accounts can be kept.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Accrington: Oxford-street Church.—At the service at Oxford-street Church on Christmas Eve selections from Handel's "Messiah" were rendered by the choir, and the minister gave an address on "Brotherhood and Peace." On Christmas Day the annual school tea was held, followed by an entertainment. The evenings of December 30 and January 1 and 2 were devoted to a series of "At Homes," all of which were very successful. The proceedings on the first day were opened by Councillor Wadsworth, of Todmorden, and Mr. J. T. Bibby, of Burnley, presided. On the second evening Mr. R. T. Pinnington, of Rawtenstall, occupied the chair, and Councillor Belsey, a local Congregationalist, in a cordial speech, performed the opening ceremony. The juniors were in full command on the last evening, Master A. Ormerod and Miss A. Boothman, two of the scholars, occupying the position of chairman and opener respectively. Programmes of vocal and instrumental music, recitations, and sketches were provided by members of the Dramatic Society.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah Jubilee Celebrations.—On Sunday last, January 7, special services were held to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of the Church of the Messiah for public worship. In the morning the Rev. L. P. Jacks, and in the evening the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, former ministers of the church, preached to large congregations. On Monday evening, January 8, the Chairman of the Vestry Committee (Mr. W. Byng Kenrick) and Mrs. Kenrick held a reception for members of the congregation at the Botanical Gardens, Edgbaston. Musical items were provided by the choir and were greatly appreciated. Mr. Byng Kenrick expressed the thanks of the church to the Revs. L. P. Jacks and H. E. Dowson for their readiness to help on such an occasion; and Mr. Dowson, who responded, spoke with deep feeling, touched with humour, of the years he spent as co-pastor with the Rev. S. Bache. Mr. Priestley Smith was wittily reminiscent from the layman's point of view; and the Rev. Joseph Wood voiced the congratulations and good wishes of the neighbouring churches. The Rev. J. W. Austin, who said that his thoughts naturally turned to the future of the church, appealed to the younger members to maintain its great traditions and to do their part in the battles which had still to be fought for their faith.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—It is a great satisfaction to the workers associated with this mission that Mr. W. J. Clarke has resumed his Sunday duties, and hopes very shortly to again enter upon the whole of his manifold and varied mission labours. He preached for the first time, since the accident which befell him last August, on Sunday evening last, when a most enthusiastic welcome was accorded to him, the chapel, floor and gallery alike, being crowded. Fortunately, in spite of the temporary physical disablement resulting from the accident, Mr. Clarke has been able to dictate all the mission correspondence, to arrange Mission affairs generally, and, when necessary, to receive committees in his room. Owing to this, and also to the circumstance that both the Mission staff and the small army of devoted voluntary workers have risen to the emergency splendidly; and though the work during the Christmas and New Year season is always of an exceptionally arduous character, everything has gone on very much as usual, and without a hitch of any sort. The calls it has made on the zeal and energy of those responsible for it will be realised when it is stated that (apart from the three services held in the chapel every Sunday, and the work of the Sunday schools), reckoning from about the middle of December last to the present time, upwards of 1,700 visits have been paid to and received from the poor, 250 medical notes distributed, and food, fuel, nourishments, garments, &c., supplied in upwards of 400 cases. In addition to this (under the auspices of the Police Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children) upwards of 2,100 poor children have received footwear and clothing at the hands of the Mission staff; a special distribution of home comforts among the deserving poor was made on December 23, a breakfast and gift was given to upwards of 320 poor children on Christmas morning; and a dinner and New Year's gift to 220 poor aged people on New Year's day. Christmas and New Year gatherings have been held in connection with the Sunday schools, the Sunday morning Adult Class, the Teachers' Society, the Infants' school, the Sunday school choir, the P.S.A., the evening congregation, the Senior Band of Hope, the Girls' Social Club, the Boys' Life Brigade, and the Mothers' Meeting. It is calculated that during the same period (including the work connected with the Missionary's annual Christmas appeal) the correspondence must have included upward of some 8,000 communications; while in various ways, through the chapel services, the Sunday schools and Christmas and New Year gatherings, and the social and philanthropic efforts, the Mission must have come into direct contact with not fewer than 7,000 individual lives.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The annual Christmas Fair was a great success. It was opened on Saturday, December 30, by Mr. Thomas Harwood, who said that he was glad to see that the movement they represented was advancing at home as well as abroad. On two occasions the lectures of Dr. Carpenter had attracted audiences of 650 people in Bolton, and the churches themselves were flourishing. The minister, the Rev. Edward Morgan, welcomed all friends, and gave thanks to all the workers and to the visitors for their help. On the second day Mr. Joseph Lancaster, jun., acted as opener. As an old worker he gave many pleasant reminiscences of work in past years, and spoke with great hopefulness of the outlook for the future. A sum of £256 was realised, an advance on the previous year, and this is very satisfactory considering that Bolton is in the midst of a "lock-out."

Crewe: Appointment.—The Rev. George Pegler, B.A., of Newcastle-under-Lyme, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Free Christian Church at Crewe, and will commence his ministry there in April next.

Derby: Friar Gate Chapel.—Through the death of Mrs. Fritchley the Friar Gate Chapel congregation loses one of its oldest and most earnest members, who was respected and loved by all for her gentle and sympathetic nature, and the simplicity of her life and character. Although failing health had for a long time confined Mrs. Fritchley to her home she kept up her interest in the church, and by working with her industrious needle helped to supply the stalls at the bazaar. Her long life was brightened by the devotion and tenderness of those who made up her domestic circle, and are now left to mourn her loss.

Liverpool: Ullet-road Church.—At a meeting of the members of the congregation of Ullet-road Church, held on Sunday, December 3, a resolution was carried with much cordiality, offering to Mr. Russell the post of junior colleague with Mr. Odgers on the termination of his assistantship next summer. Mr. Russell has willingly accepted this proposal. Mr. Odgers is glad to think that one with whom he has co-operated very harmoniously since August, 1910, will thus be enabled to continue to afford him his ready help; and the congregation is confident that such an arrangement will prove to be a very happy augury for the future.

Manchester: Longsight.—On Monday evening, January 8, a congregational "At Home" was held in Gaskell Hall, and was well attended. As the pulpit is at present vacant, the Rev. N. Anderton, of Monton, President of the Manchester District Association, was invited to give an address, which dealt with the general social unrest and the work of the churches. An appeal is about to be issued with the object of raising a sum of £1,250 for certain specified purposes. Mr. Anderton expressed the hope that an early appointment of a minister would be made, and urged the congregation to remain steadfast and loyal to the church during the interregnum. On Sunday, January 7, Mr. Oliver H. Heys completed 25 years as voluntary organist and choirmaster of the church.

Northampton: Kettering-road Church.—The first meeting of the Unitarian Institute was held in the church on Sunday, January 7. It was followed in the evening by a special service for young people, and on Monday a soiree was held. The Institute, of which all scholars over 16 years of age (numbering at present about 70) can be members, represents our effort to connect the work of the Sunday school with that of the church. Teachers and members of the congregation are eligible for enrolment as honorary members. A strong central committee has been formed for the general management, which will have the oversight of a number of sectional committees acting as executives of various branches of work. Most members will be allotted definite duties and will take part in the religious services of the Institute.

Peckham: Avondale-road.—The members of the choir spent several evenings before Christmas going around the neighbourhood singing carols, and as a result the sum of £7 1s. 6d. was collected. Having made grants to Winifred House and to the Church and Sunday School Sympathy Funds, the balance was expended in a tea and entertainment to old people, which was given in the Lecture Hall on Friday, the 5th inst.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

DONCASTER FREE LIBRARY.

We learn from the Doncaster Gazette that Principal Carpenter's recent book on the "Historical Jesus and the Theological Christ" has been refused admission to the Doncaster Free Library on the ground that it is of a "controversial" nature. This paternal supervision on the part of Town Councils is really rather amusing. In all ages bumbledom has supposed that it could put the mind in chains, and destroy the light of truth by the simple device of drawing down the blinds. Nowadays sensible people will think it hardly worth while to be angry, they will only be inclined to laugh at another example of the solemn stupidity of "censorship" and its dread of serious problems and downright thinking.

DR. SOPHIA JEX-BLAKE.

The death of Dr. Sophia Jex-Blake has drawn public attention once more to the splendid services she rendered to humanity, when she waged a prolonged war in Edinburgh, in the early seventies, in support of the claim of women to be allowed to enter the medical profession. That such a woman, highly gifted, inspired by a strong sense of justice, and filled with zeal for the advancement of her own sex, should have been treated with contumely and mobbed in the streets of Edinburgh, when her desires became known, was, perhaps, only to be expected forty years ago. That she should not have been able to start practice on her own account until twelve years had elapsed from the time when she began her studies is one more proof of the tremendous opposition which women have had to face, from time immemorial, when they have pleaded for the opening of doors previously closed to them. Miss Jex-Blake was, however, one of those valiant pioneers for whom the word defeat does not exist, and her persistent efforts on behalf of a cause that made life-long claims on her time and energies was fitly crowned by the founding of the Edinburgh School of Medicine for Women, which in 1894 the University of Edinburgh decided to recognise for graduation. She was the author of several books, and in her early days travelled much on the Continent, and in America, where she became greatly interested in the work of Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell, the pioneer woman doctor, who had gained her diploma as far back as 1849.

LETCHWORTH GARDEN CITY.

Although it will not be possible to declare a dividend for two or three years, the directors of the First Garden City, Ltd., who have just issued a most encouraging report, consider that the idea now being carried out at Letchworth has proved itself economically and financially sound. Last year the accounts showed an adverse balance on the general revenue and expenditure account of £1,676, whereas for the year under review the net profit, after paying interest on borrowed capital, amounts to £174, an improvement of £1,850. Each of the last three years has shown a similar improvement, and there is reason to hope that the Company's profit will grow year by year.

The number of new houses, shops, and public buildings built, or in process of erection on November 15, 1911, was 1,515 and, in addition, 49 factories and workshops, compared with 1,292 houses, shops, and public buildings, and 42 factories and workshops on November 15, 1910. There were 115 houses, schools, &c., on the estate when purchased by the Company, making a total of 1,679 permanent buildings on November 15 last. The health of the town continues to be excellent, and the death-rates are believed to be the lowest in England.

DR. WALTER COPLAND PERRY.

The death occurred on December 28 of Dr. Walter Copland Perry, a well-known member of the Athenæum Club, of which he was probably the oldest member. He was also Senior Alumnus of Manchester College. Dr. Perry was a notable scholar, and the author of many valuable works on classical and mediæval subjects. The son of the Rev. Isaac Perry, once a Congregational, afterwards a Unitarian minister at Norwich and Ipswich, he himself entered the ministry after a course at Manchester College, York, and was assistant to the Rev. Henry Acton, at George's Meeting, Exeter, from 1838 to 1844. In that year he conformed, but without taking orders, and later on established a successful school at Bonn, among his pupils being the late Lord Lytton, and Sir Francis Bertie, British Ambassador in Paris. The late Emperor Frederick retained the kindest recollections of him, and in 1887, when at Buckingham Place, produced an English prayer-book with which Dr. Perry had presented him 30 years before. Dr. Perry returned to England somewhere about 1878, and settled in London, where he devoted himself to Greek and Roman art, and wrote several books. On his ninetieth birthday he was entertained at dinner by a number of his old pupils and friends, and his literary energy was maintained in a remarkable way for four more years. He died at the age of 97.

THE REMINISCENT DEAN.

After hearing so much about the "gloomy Dean" lately, it is refreshing to find that there is a dean who is the reverse of gloomy, though he has reached his 80th year. Dean Pigou, who was seen by a representative of the Daily News during the week when he was celebrating his birthday, impressed the interviewer with his youthful cheeriness and vigour, and, as might have been expected, some of the delightful anecdotes for which he is famous enlivened the conversation.

* * *

One of these related to Goldwin Smith. "You may not know," said the Dean, "that my cousin, Goldwin Smith, was a constant contributor to the Daily News forty years ago or thereabouts. That reminds me. He was thinking, I believe, of a forthcoming article for the Daily News one day at breakfast when his father, perhaps a trifle piqued by his long silence, exclaimed 'A penny for your thoughts, Goldwin.' 'My thoughts,' said Goldwin with a start. 'Oh, I was merely thinking how awful it must be for a giraffe to have a sore throat.' Goldwin as I remember him was a man of trying moods, but everything he wrote bore the mark of distinction."

* * *

The Dean has many quaint stories to tell about vergers he has known. On one occasion, before the passing of the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill, a Halifax verger allowed him to marry unconsciously an aged couple within the prohibited degrees. When remonstrated with the verger replied, "Well, vicar, it was just this way, do you see; one of the parties was eighty-four and t' other eighty-six. I says to myself, 'It can't last long; let 'em wed, and bother the laws.'"

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A GREAT meeting of protest against the present British policy in Persia was held in the new London Opera House last Monday, when the following resolution was carried unanimously :—" That this meeting expresses its deep concern at the continued disregard of the undertaking jointly given by the Governments of Great Britain and Russia in 1907 to preserve Persian integrity and independence, and urges His Majesty's Government to pursue a policy so directed as to give full effect to our pledges to Persia, and thus to safeguard our national honour and vital interests." The meeting itself was of a non-party character, and the vital interests of commerce and the safety of India were ably represented by many speakers.

It is, however, with all that is implied in the phrase " national honour " that we are specially concerned here. We view with growing alarm a disposition to make the non-moral considerations of expediency dominant in foreign policy. The pledged word of a treaty and respect for the liberties of small nationalities count for less than they once did in our international relations. We are in danger of sinking into a mood of cynical indifference to anything but our own safety or advantage. Nothing, we are convinced, could be more short-sighted or, in the long run, more disastrous. Righteousness and honour are more than counters in a political game. It is upon their unseen foundations that the whole fabric of the modern civilised state is built up. To ignore their authority or to quench the idealism which they infuse into our political and social relationships is to menace us with a reversion into barbarism. Men who grow accustomed to treating broken treaties or outraged liberties with a light heart, will soon learn to think less seriously of their pledged word in business or the justice which they owe to their neighbour.

BISHOP WELLDON, in an address which he delivered on Tuesday at the Islington Conference of Evangelical Clergy, said that it was the laxity of doctrinal belief in recent years which had done much to paralyse the strength of religious energy. Modernism, and especially the modern criticism of the Bible, in so far as it tended to whittle away the distinctly supernatural element in the Christian creeds, might be said to sap the very life of Christianity. A non-miraculous Christianity was no Christianity at all. It possessed no strength, no enthusiasm, no inspiration. In the interest of a diffusive and aggressive Christianity it was better to believe too much than too little. Contrasting Unitarianism with Roman Catholicism, he said that there was no doubt that the Church which erred on the side of defect was incomparably weaker than the Church which erred on the side of excess in missionary zeal and fervour for winning souls.

* * *

In all this, Bishop Welldon seems to us to show little breadth of mind and small insight into the real sources of spiritual power. His appeal to credulity is a dangerous weapon, and might be turned by an opponent with telling effect against the meagreness of his own creed. If missionary zeal is to be taken as the safest guarantee apart from the patient study of history and the thoughtful interpretation of spiritual experience, then the creed of the early Jesuit preachers in India has a better claim to be accepted as true than modern evangelicalism.

WITH a strange and evidently quite unconscious inconsistency, Bishop Welldon closed his address with an appeal to the Cross, and the Cross alone, as the one abiding secret of spiritual strength and power. But here he singles out, we believe with a perfectly true instinct, as the supreme manifestation of the love and life-giving power of Christ his surrender of himself upon the cross, which was not " miraculous " at all as the word is usually understood. It is not by signs and wonders that the truth of Christianity is known. It is life that kindles life.

* * *

At a conference to consider the election of a Chief Rabbi in succession to the late Dr. Adler, which was held in London last Sunday, Lord Rothschild, who presided, was careful to point out, that while they all represented orthodox views, by which he understood adherence to the ancient faith and loyalty to their religious tradition, it was one of the cardinal principles that the new Chief Rabbi should not have power to denounce anathema against any individual or body that chose to adopt other than orthodox opinions. Eventually a resolution was carried providing that the Chief Rabbi shall have no power to deprive any member of his religious rights in the synagogue.

WE have called attention several times to the broad-minded articles on current religious topics which appear from time to time in the Nation. In an article on " The Passing of the Oxford Movement " last week, the writer emphasised the grave danger which has arisen through "an unmistakable and increasing divergence between the clerical and lay mind." Formerly this state of things did not exist to anything like the same extent because we had one education, in which Englishmen shared according to their opportunities. "The denominational idea," the article continues, "whether it finds expression in the theological college or the sectarian school, is fatal to this unity. It separates, and because it separates, it comes inevitably to connote 'a particular and inferior mentality'; to mean a vision in blinkers, which sees only what it is thought desirable that it should see. But the world of ideas is undenominational; and 'things are what they are.' An Anglican or a Nonconformist history, a Catholic or a Protestant philosophy, science, or theology, is a contradiction in terms."

* * *

THE writer goes on to utter a serious warning against the professionalising of religion, which has followed in the wake of the Oxford Movement, leading as it does to something similar to the contempt of the lay mind for clerical opinion with which we are familiar in Catholic countries. "There is an increasing tendency to regard the clergy, and the zealous but not very numerous laymen who make religion their hobby as intellectually a negligible quantity. They are estimable as individuals; their social and political importance is considerable; but from the point of view of the things of the mind they do not count." These are severe words, but the warning is needed, and there is probably no church or organised religious group in the country which does not need to take them to heart. Professionalism is not the exclusive possession of the ritualists.

THE Historical Association, which has been holding its sixth annual meetings in Manchester, is doing a quiet and much-needed work for English education. Slowly the idea is disappearing that history should not be taught when it offends political or religious prejudices, and the best teachers accept it now as a fine discipline in truthfulness, tolerance, and sympathy. In an interesting address at Manchester, Mrs. J. R. Green pointed out how historical knowledge helps to destroy racial prejudice by increasing wisdom and giving insight into differences of national temperament. Apt reference to Irish history, and the profound ignorance of most English people on the subject, helped to drive the lesson home. "One of the difficulties that have arisen between the two countries," she said, "arises from its being so hard for a people who live intensely in the present and the immediate future like the English, to understand those to whom the far past and far future are also a part of the furniture of their daily lives."

THE announcement of the approaching retirement of the Rev. Joseph Wood from the pulpit of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, which he has held for 28 years, will be received with deep and widespread regret. It means the withdrawal from the ranks of the active ministry of an able and eloquent preacher, a bold advocate of educational reform and democratic freedom, and a tireless worker for the common good. He belongs to the small group of highly gifted ministers who have made Birmingham Nonconformity a power in the land. His vigorous personality, his wide reading in modern English literature, and his musical gifts have given a distinctive note to the services at the Old Meeting Church, and enriched its fine traditions of Christian liberty and spiritual worship.

THE death of General Frederick Maurice has been made the occasion for much deserved eulogy of his gifts as a writer of military history; but hardly enough has been said of the skill with which he accomplished the very difficult task of writing his father's life. The Biography of Frederick Denison Maurice is never likely to be a very popular book, but it contains a spiritual portrait of exceptional delicacy and refinement. It has become the fashion in recent years to speak almost in tones of disparagement of Maurice as a weak thinker or an ineffectual visionary. It is a strange judgment to pass on a man who had such kindling power for other souls. Whatever his failure as a systematic thinker may have been, he had spiritual genius, "the vision and the faculty divine," and of all the great things which enter into human experience that is the greatest, in its mysterious beauty and compelling power.

IN the case of a man like the late Mr. Henry Labouchere death is a great revealer. The cynical mask drops away and the things for which he cared become plain. It has been observed of him that he brought a French mind to bear upon English life, and this was the cause of a good deal of misunderstanding. Both his enthusiasms and his wit were intellectual in their quality. His undaunted pursuit of shams had in it more of the spirit of Montaigne than of the nineteenth century English man of the world with his conventional religion and limited curiosity. To bring the humbug to justice is a task far removed from the high offices of Christian charity, but it is a serviceable part of public morals which few men have had the gift to perform with such relentless good humour.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

WHERE SAINTS HAVE TROD.*

BY THE REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

It is a great joy and a real privilege to me to resume these Devotional Evenings, when we can talk again in a natural and intimate way of the deepest things of religion. It is a peculiar satisfaction to feel that what we do here is of a purely voluntary character, without any sort of expectation or obligation on the part of anyone. It is not required of me as part of my regular duty to conduct these services, you are not required to come to them by any established custom of piety, and, I presume, would not come to them unless you, like myself, found them really helpful. Then, I confess, I like very much the thought that they cost us nothing, and that there is no subscription and no collection. It is as if our church had been endowed by the past, and we were (as indeed we are) free partakers of its spiritual hospitality. It is to me a precious thought to be much cherished and valued that at least one service here accords so nearly to the ideal of the gospel which is without money and without price; that we can invite anyone to come here without expectation of pew-rent or of offering.

And yet there must be a cost if these services are to be profitable, and there must be an offering. There is the cost of our own soul's preparation, the offering of our self as a living and reasonable sacrifice. We all come here to gain something: some new softening of the heart in prayer; some fresh joy of religious experience; some deeper sense of what our existence means, and where its anchorage is to be found in the midst of all the heaving waves and agitations of life. The world is so busy, and we are so distracted. We need quiet and calm, the soothing touch of God upon our fevered restlessness. Time passes, the years multiply, and earnest men and women want to grow nearer to the heart of Christ, and to live more simply and honestly in his spirit. There is so much surface-fret, so much that is superficial in our experience. We cannot avoid it; for the world in some way and in some degree claims us all and makes large demands upon us. But we feel that we do not belong to the world but to God and his Divine Order, and so we seek his face; we wish to realise his Presence in the midst of and through our ordinary day-to-day activities; we desire to gain a firm footing within that Divine Realm to which we belong, and of which we are inheritors. But in order to gain we must give. We must give ourselves. We must offer something which is valuable for the sake of something that is more valuable; we must sacrifice the smaller pearls of pleasure for the sake of the pearl of great price. We must prepare ourselves by self-recollection, by reading, by meditation, by prayer.

Week by week, as we gather together here, I hope to introduce to you some beautiful passage of reading chosen from the books of devotion—written by the great saints of the Christian Church, by men or women who have probed deep into the heart of religious reality. Those passages will have their effect on us. But they will influence us differently according as we have ears to hear and hearts to respond. In some way they will, I hope, stimulate us all, to better and holier living, to a sincerer love for Christ, and a deeper worship of God.

And yet I could understand it if at first they rather discouraged than encouraged some of us. These men of whom we read were so high, and we are so low. They had advanced so far into the secret things of the spirit, and we are still such laggards lingering slothfully behind. It is as if a young musician, just beginning to believe he was making headway, heard the performance of a great outstanding player, and realised not only the innate musical genius of the man, but the hours, and days, and months, and years of discipline, of training, of struggle against self and almost insuperable difficulties it must all have meant before this result had become possible. It is as if some one who began to love form and colour, and had the stirrings of young ambition in him, were suddenly placed in the midst of the National Gallery and saw the rarest, choicest examples of the art of all the world through all the ages. Such an experience may have two contrary effects. It may crush aspiration at the outset with the sense of the hopelessness of emulation. It may set on fire an inextinguishable passion to offer "the utmost to the Highest." So it is when we read the tenderest breathings of the devout life in these saints. It may make us weep to think we cannot be good like that. And it may also kindle in our heart a flame of devotion which neither contradiction within nor persecution without may ever extinguish. It may make us feel—These men and women from weakness became strong: from sin became holy. So might I, if only I were sufficiently in earnest, and tried hard enough, and loved sublimely enough; if only I had the courage to be candid and open and simple; if only I had the heroism not to be ashamed to be meek and childlike; if only I could be so humble as to kill my besetting pride and yield myself in glad and joyous self-surrender to the Love that is over all, Blessed for ever. If music ravished the soul of the young student like a song of angels: if beauty wooed the young artist with an irresistible and pleading spell, they would not desist, but begin simply, simply, so very simply, at the very bottom, stumbling among the mere alphabet of Art, yet ever conscious of a haunting loveliness beckoning them on with a power that their souls could never deny.

And so with us. If the Beauty of Holiness should really fall like a great light upon our spirits; if the Love of God should once touch us with its unearthly sweetness, we should not be discouraged any more, we should follow the footsteps of the saints, led and guided by their tracks, fed and nourished by the same breath from Heaven that sustained their quest, consoled by the same tenderness of communion with the Divine, and enraptured by the same glimpses and visions of the only and eternally Fair.

And in order to pursue this Ideal of Devotion and of Saintliness it is not necessary that we should have some very special equipment beyond the common human nature that belongs to all of us. We are not all called to be painters, or poets, or writers; but we are "called to be saints": that is to say, we are called to give our utmost for the Highest. We are called to be our very Best, we are summoned to develop the Perfection of our being. And this is only another way of saying that we are called to love the Lord our God with all our heart and mind and strength and soul, and our neighbour as ourself. We are invited by that ever-valid, ever-enduring invitation—Ye therefore shall be Perfect even as your Heavenly Father is Perfect. Ye shall be perfect in Sonship even as He is perfect in Fatherhood. It is a far high call, and it falls upon us like a voice from the mountain tops on the gross ears of men in the valley. But it may also fall as starlight and as sunlight reflected in the bosom of a calm and peaceful lake. There was nothing in the birth, or breeding, or education of the early followers of Christ to account for their yielding so eagerly to his call. But it was a call they could not resist. He looked at them: he loved them: his spirit wound itself about their heart, and broke down their resistance. They felt the love of God in him as a caress that compelled them to leave all and follow.

And in the midst of our world he comes to us invisibly, as the spirit of our divinest life. The same spirit that conquered Magdalen, conquered Paul. The same spirit that conquers the foulness of sensuality, conquers the pride of scholarship—all at last must become captive to the Christ Spirit. All at last must bare the inward bosom and cry, bereft of all lesser comfort—"Here am I, take me."

May we all at the beginning of this year offer to God this costing sacrifice of ourselves, and resolve to walk daily closer to Him, in the Spirit of Christ treading softly where the saints have trod.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

THE optimism of the American people is a most delightful thing to remember, if it is a little difficult to emulate on our own account at a distance of three thousand miles. We are a chastened people, and although there is plenty of life in us still we have gone through too many struggles, suffered too many disappointments, and perhaps experienced too many damp and foggy winters to face the future with the buoyancy and self-confidence so characteristic of our cousins across the Atlantic. We do our best, but for us freedom is "sober-suited," and "slowly broadens down from precedent to precedent." In America it holds aloft a flaming torch, like the goddess of Liberty in New York Harbour, and urges men along the path of progress with all the impatient ardour of youth. Naturally in a country so vast, containing such unlimited resources, and such magnificent opportunities for expansion and development, nothing seems impossible, and it is quite easy to feel, while under the influence of its sparkling atmosphere, that the achievements of the past hundred years are as nothing to those which will be accomplished when the constructive forces now taking shape have begun to make themselves really felt. At the same time there is always a danger lest work which is hurriedly done should not be lasting, and there are signs on every hand that the rapid progress of America has been accomplished without sufficient regard to the laying of social foundations upon which future generations may build in safety.

In spite of the splendid start which was made by the original settlers in the New World, where it was possible for man to live his own life fearlessly and adventurously, unhampered by paralysing dogmas and the feudal spirit of old England, they did not realise that they were forging fresh fetters for their descendants when they preached an intoxicating religion of freedom which was really a greater superstition than any they had overthrown. The preaching of the religion of freedom had ended in a conflict between capital and labour which is everywhere growing more acute. The same thing is happening, of course, all over Europe as well, but in no country is the struggle likely to be more fierce and unrestrained than in this land of liberty, where the individualist spirit has gone unchecked so long, and where the powerful few are as reluctant to submit themselves to laws made in the interests of the many as the most ancient aristocracies.

For this reason even the men of the older generation are prophesying a serious setback for the country before many years are over, and all thinking people realise that the future prosperity of America depends on the way in which the great social problems which are beginning to menace her peace of mind are handled in the next ten or twenty years. Those problems are infinitely more difficult to solve than our own, because they are complicated by the negro question and the immigrant question, which are becoming a veritable nightmare to the sociologist. The need of political reform is also very urgent; indeed, it may safely be said that until politics are rescued from the control of those whose one ambition is to manipulate the legislative machinery, and confuse the judgment of the voter, in their own interests, all the great elements of civilisation will be held in check.

There, is however, something in the American temperament, and in the American atmosphere, which tempts one to lend a willing ear to those sanguine prophets who tell us that an entirely new type of humanity is being evolved from the mingling of races in the United States, and that this new type is to inaugurate the next great epoch in the world's history. Perhaps it is best to confess, as a well-known preacher has done, that such speculations rest upon a train of reasoning unfamiliar to most of us, and are therefore to be accepted with reserve. But in America it is as difficult to believe that there can be any limit to the enterprise and inventiveness of the people who make up its varied population as it is impossible to conceal your admiration for the wonderful civilisation they have built up already, in the midst of desolate prairies, on the shores of wide rivers and great inland seas, and at the foot of mountain ranges linked together by the transcontinental railways. People talk of the tyranny of the trusts, of the vices of the cities, of the luxuriousness of the plutocrat and the irreligion of the masses as if these things were, indeed, heralding the downfall of another Rome. But it is not a decadent spirit that breathes through the vast open spaces of America, and there is little sign of approaching stagnation in those flourishing towns through which the traveller is rapidly whirled on his way to the Middle West. There is to be found in various parts, unhappily, all the squalor of our own slum areas and manufacturing towns. We have heard things about Pittsburg, the Chicago stock-yards, and the Pennsylvania collieries which it is not easy to forget, even amid the glories of the Berkshire Hills in New England, or by the foaming Niagara Rapids. And doubtless a modern Juvenal would find much food for satire in the fashionable crowds which throng the Waldorf-Astoria in New York, or squander the earnings of many a son of toil in jewellery at Tiffany's. But you cannot travel for even a week in America without realising that there are thousands and thousands of happy, comfortable homes filled with people who do their fair share of the world's work, surrounded by healthy, laughing children, where the word decadence would simply not be understood—homes in which the old religious traditions are still honoured and the sanctities of family life respected—homes from which come the splendid girls, with their well-poised heads and candid eyes, and the keen-faced youths full of "grit" and intelligence of whom the New World is so proud.

The visitor is constantly struck with the kindness and sociability, the cheeriness and toleration, the frank humour and abundant common-sense of the people in general. And then, too, if one is weary of class distinctions in England, of the perpetual struggle of the middle-class to edge further away from the artisan and nearer to the aristocrat, the absence of snobbishness is very refreshing. Every man is a "self-made man," more or less, but that expression has not the same connotation in America as in England, where an accidental lack of aspirates so often serves in the most pathetic way to maintain the gulf which yawns between some nouveau riche from Sheffield or the Five Towns, and the "society" people with whom his wife and daughters are anxious to be on visiting terms. The Americans have this advantage that they are (if you exclude the negroes, and immigrants who have just arrived) an educated people; "the average of knowledge is higher," to quote Mr. Bryce, "the habit of reading and thinking more generally diffused, than in any other country." They are also free from those servile traditions which destroy self-confidence and freedom of speech, and frequently make it difficult for a man in a small way of business in England to call his soul his own, either politically or religiously, without risking the disapproval of the "gentry" on whom he may have to depend for a livelihood. In popular language and almost entirely in popular opinion, one man is, roughly speaking, as good as another, and it is not supposed to be beneath the dignity of well-brought-up people to turn their hands to anything. At the International Hotel, Niagara Falls, the waiter at one of the tables was a handsome young medical student from Canada, who was earning the money for his college fees during the vacation in a manner which would hardly commend itself to an English undergraduate. He was assisted by a negro from Alabama, who was also studying medicine, and who was quite ready to talk about Booker Washington and Professor Dubois as he served us with succotash, sliced peaches, or pumpkin pie. In two or three different hotels where the writer stayed in New England the waiting was done by girls—in the daintiest white muslin dresses and aprons, and with their hair charmingly arranged—who often turned out to be school teachers also occupied in adding to their incomes during holiday time. Such an utter absence of false pride can only be disconcerting to those whose old-fashioned prejudices will not permit them to adjust their minds immediately to a democratic state of society. There is, indeed, something fine about it which appeals to all who have had the courage to look the thing called snobbery once and for all in the face, and who realise, even while they do not expect to see it vanish for a long time in this country, what a vicious, stupid, pitiable, and entirely unchristian thing it is.

One would like to say a good deal more about the national traits of the American people, some of which are so immediately obvious that even a very brief visit will serve to acquaint the traveller with them, unless the time is wholly spent in hotels, and in mere sight-seeing. Their wonderful enterprise, their liking for outdoor pleasures, their appreciation of what are called the "sterling qualities," their love of children, their self-reliance, their wit and good humour; to say nothing of their comfortable homes, and the green, friendly gardens that are on such good terms with the sidewalk that no wall or fence, as a rule, is permitted to come between them—all these things are delightful to recall. The observant visitor comes back to England with the impression that America is altogether more intensely interesting than one had been led to expect even by its admirers. She is different from anything that we had imagined, she is greater than we had dreamed, and she is as passionately alive and full of social and temperamental complexities, to say nothing of stupendous hopes and ideals, as we might expect a nation to be that is spreading civilisation over a continuous area of land, which, leaving Alaska out of account altogether, is "equal to Great Britain, France, the German Empire, the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Italy, Belgium, Japan, Holland, Spain and Portugal, Sweden and Norway, Turkey in Europe, Egypt, and the whole Empire of India," and populated by a multitude of people from all the corners of the earth.

"HOW READEST THOU?"

WE had been having quite a hot discussion on Inspiration—hot, but amicable, for we were all old friends, fond of argument, accustomed to attack one another's opinions unsparingly, and perfectly willing to give and take. On this occasion—a Sunday afternoon—having aired our views on the usual theories of verbal and plenary inspiration, we were getting half-inclined to leave the subject when Markham, my cousin John's especial chum, started us off on a new tack by saying, in answer to the more orthodox members of the party:

"What I can't understand is this: You all seem, to some extent, to accept the New Testament as an authority; and yet you are always saying and doing things which go diametrically against it."

There was a general murmur of sad assent, and my friend Stapleton—our host—voiced the feeling of us all when he said, "That is too true."

"Oh!" said Markham, "you don't see my meaning. Of course, in the matter of living up to our principles we all have abundant cause for self-reproach, but it is certainly not for me to see the mote in my brothers' eyes. No; doubtless many of us give way to anger and speak unkindly of one another even after recently reading the Sermon on the Mount, but everyone acknowledges the duty of being kind and forbearing. What I wonder at is that people who profess to be guided by the New Testament hold theories of life entirely opposed to its teaching."

"I think," I said, "we should understand better what you mean if you would give us some examples."

"Well," replied Markham, "one of the most glaring instances of this inconsistency is the treatment of the story of Martha and Mary. In the Gospel narrative, the verdict of Jesus is decidedly in Mary's favour. He reproaches Martha for being 'careful and troubled about many things, cumbered with much serving,' forgetful of 'the one thing needful,' while Mary is praised as having 'chosen the better part which shall not be taken from her'; and yet orthodox Christians discover all sorts of unrecorded virtues in Martha, and almost invariably, in real life, give the preference to people of her type over people of Mary's type."

"Well, don't you think there is much to be said for Martha?" someone asked.

"That is nothing to the point. The question is: What is the verdict of Jesus? And on that there can be no doubt."

"Give us another example," I said.

"Well," replied Markham, "there is nothing more common than to hear religious people—as well as other folks—describe words as of slight value; and yet, in the New Testament, we read: 'Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh'; and even, 'By thy words thou shalt be justified and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.'"

"But, surely," objected my cousin, "on the other hand, we read a great deal in the New Testament about the value of deeds. Look at the Epistle of James and the parable of the house on the rock and the house on the sand."

"We do hear a great deal about deeds," it is true," answered Markham, "but I don't remember any passage in which words are opposed to deeds. In the Epistle of James, deeds (or works) are preferred to faith; and, in the Gospels, it is generally doers and hearers (not speakers) that are contrasted."

Against this we could say nothing.

"And then," Markham went on, after a pause, "there's the parable of the talents. Nothing could surely be clearer than its teaching: that it is our duty to cultivate our powers to the utmost; and that we cannot justify ourselves for not developing them by the plea that we are afraid of using them wrongly, for the servant who makes this excuse is condemned as 'slothful and wicked'; and yet how many people bury their talents and are considered both by themselves and others to be virtuous in so doing! Why, I have just been reading a biography of an artist who went into a monastery, and, though the monastic authorities did not require him to cease painting, he voluntarily gave it up because, forsooth, he feared it would absorb too much of his thoughts. I believe he said 'distract' his 'mind from God'—just as if God hadn't given him the talent and, by giving it, shouted into his ear (one may almost say) the command to be an artist. He was just like the 'wicked and unprofitable servant' in the parable; and yet, though—to their honour be it said—the monastic authorities did not forbid his painting, they thought him a very holy man for refraining from it, and so, evidently, does the writer of the biography."

At this juncture we awoke to the fact that Mrs. Brodrick, Stapleton's aunt and our hostess, was standing near the door. We rose to greet her, with apologies.

"I am so glad you didn't see me," she answered, "for you would have interrupted Mr. Markham, and I was so much interested in what he was saying. It made me think of that dear good Miss Yonge, whose books were the delight of our schooldays. There's scarcely a story of hers in which someone does not bury a talent, and the burial is counted for righteousness to him or her. At this moment I remember Ethel and Norman May, and Lance Underwood, and I know there are a lot more whom I can't think of just now. In fact, much as I like Miss Yonge's stories and admire many traits in her character, I never give her books to my girl friends."

"I should have thought you would have objected to Miss Yonge's works," I said, "chiefly because of their religious narrowness."

"No," said Mrs. Brodrick, "I don't think that makes much impression on young people; they generally want to get on with the story and skip the churchy talk. Besides, if they do read it, those brought up in the church have already been taught to think as Miss Yonge does, and those who haven't accept it as a peculiarity of the author. But the matter of the talent-burying is of the very woof of the story, so it must dwell in the mind of any attentive reader."

There was a pause, after which Markham began again: "Then there's Sabbatarianism in the teeth of all that Jesus said against it, and —"

"And war," said Stapleton.

"And class exclusiveness," chimed in another voice. But Markham rejected both these additions, saying that these evils were transgressions of the spirit of Christianity, rather than of the actual words of the New Testament, which were his immediate concern.

Then, after a discussion on non-resistance, my cousin turned to Markham and said: "You have certainly proved your case, and yet—well, really I don't quite see what we are to do. Now, take this question of the talents. We are taught to pray, 'Lead us not into temptation.' How can we ask that if we run into temptation of our own accord? And then there is the explicit command: 'If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off. If thine eye offend thee, pull it out.'"

"That surely does not mean that we are to bury our talents," I interposed. "It may mean only that we must give up things that cause us to sin, e.g., those who have a tendency to intemperance must abstain from wine; and, if we can't go to theatres without unfitting ourselves for work the next day, we must give up going, except on holidays."

"Wine and theatres are hardly a right hand or an eye," objected Stapleton.

"Well," persisted my cousin, "what's to be done? Who is to decide which passages we should follow?"

"Practically," replied Markham, "each one decides for himself. But, you see, the fact of the conflicting commands shows that Christians really are not guided by the New Testament. They merely choose which of its precepts they will obey."

"Ah!" said Stapleton. "Now we're in for your usual lecture against authority and in favour of reason and conscience."

"I'm afraid I've got round to that again," said Markham, smiling, "but when I began, what was running in my head was the couplet:

'Compound for sins you have a mind to,
By damning those you're not inclined to.'

I was not objecting to the propensity to set up an authority, but girding against the discarding of authorities whenever they say anything that does not fit in with our pre-conceived ideas."

"Still," persisted my cousin, "you haven't answered my question: What is to be done?"

"I confess," said Markham, "I see no way out for those who hold on to the plenary inspiration theory. But, at any rate, I am sure they have no right to assume that they need only pay heed to passages that express their own views. Judging, however, by what has been said this afternoon, none of us holds this extreme position. On the other hand, we all—even the most heterodox of us—have an affectionate regard for the New Testament and think it worthy of attentive study. Why, then, should we refuse to pay heed to it when it presents a side of things on which we are by nature disinclined to look?"

"I am afraid we can't justify ourselves," said my cousin, "but I must say that you sin with us, if I may judge by your examples."

"I often catch myself falling into this sin, with regard to both the Bible and other literature," Markham readily admitted, "and I dare say I am often guilty of it unwittingly. With regard to the examples, however, I had to speak of passages that most people ignore, and these happen to be passages that especially appeal to me; or perhaps I ought to say I notice the ignoring of passages I love. And I can say this for myself: I have learnt much from the New Testament about the personal aspect of our relation both to God and to our fellow-men, though my own leaning is to the more abstract view of things. I have learnt that love of man is beautiful, as well as love of the ideal; that God is our Father, as well as the Source of Goodness, Beauty, and Truth."

"I cry peccavi, old fellow," said my cousin, with a friendly smile. "You have practised what you preach; and I think you have also, to some extent, at last answered my question. Perhaps, indeed, you have given the best answer possible, if it be true that 'example is better than precept.'"

THE UNPARDONABLE SIN.

ONE does not hear so much nowadays about the Unpardonable Sin, but it has been a source of great perplexity, and sometimes of distress, to readers of the Gospels, probably ever since the Gospels were there to be read. Various explanations have been suggested, and may be found in commentaries on the Gospels.

I have lately found a clue which I have never seen used in any discussion of the subject, and, as it seems a very helpful one, I offer it to any readers of THE INQUIRER who may have puzzled over the famous declaration of Jesus.

The passage which concludes with that declaration is found in Matt. xii. 22-32, and substantially the same in Mark iii. 19-30; the saying, without the incident, occurs in Luke xii. 10. Jesus was indignant at the slander against him, that he cast out devils by the help of Beelzebub, the prince of the devils. To say of such deeds as his, done by Divine help (I omit all discussion as to the miracle), that they were due to the evil one, was the wickedest lie that could be uttered. All other slanders and falsehoods uttered against men were slight by comparison; such might be forgiven, "But whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin" (Mark iii. 29). The form in Matt. xii. 32 is "... it shall not be forgiven him either in this world or in that which is to come." The phrase in Mark, "hath never forgiveness" is the key to the meaning of the whole.

The reader who only knows the Gospels, and who finds that particular phrase only here (with its variant in Matthew and Luke), naturally concludes that it is a very exceptional phrase, and means all that it can be made to mean. A short time ago I came across exactly this same phrase in the Talmud, "he hath not forgiveness for ever." The passage is j.B.K. 6c., and there it is used as a quite ordinary expression. The passage deals with cases of injury or affront between one man and another. One Rabbi says that in a case where one man has offended another, he would go to him and try to make it up, and if he did not succeed he would take some friends with him who should speak for him, and so peace should be restored. Upon which another Rabbi comments: "This will do, where it is not a case of slander, but if he has put forth a bad name against his fellowman he hath not forgiveness for ever" (en lo mechilah olamith). This means only that there is no possibility of making up the quarrel. We may hope, for the credit of human nature, that the Rabbi who offered that opinion was mistaken. But any one can see that there is no question here of a tremendous and mysterious sin which God will never forgive. It is merely a statement that the particular offence of slander, the same as that denounced in the passage in the Gospels, is an offence which is especially hard to forgive; and is, according to this Rabbi, in fact never forgiven. But neither he, nor any other Rabbi, ever dreamed of an unpardonable sin in the way that Christians have imagined it. Jesus was a Jew, speaking to Jews; and he used a form of expression which was familiar to them, and which was not, and is not, familiar to Christians. If it had been, they would have been spared much needless distress of mind.

When I found this clue, I followed it up, in order to see what was implied by the word translated "for ever," and in what sort of connections it was used, in the Talmud. I found several instances, of which it may be sufficient to mention one. In j.M.K. 83d, the point is raised whether one who has rent his garments as a sign of mourning may sew the pieces together again after the period of mourning is ended. The answer is, that this may be done in less important cases, but not after the death of father or mother. In that case, says the Talmud, "one does not sew the pieces together for ever." Precisely the same Hebrew word; and no one would dream of reading a solemn and tremendous meaning into it, when used in this common-place manner.

These instances from the Talmud go to show that the phrase was in common use amongst the Jews and that Jesus, when he used it, was not making known a theological doctrine of awful significance, but was expressing, by means of a familiar idiom of his language, the deep indignation of a just and good man. Presumably his hearers understood him so, else they would surely have been alarmed if they had supposed him to be making known the fact that there was a sin which God would never forgive. It was not until after Jesus was dead and gone, and when his words were read by people who did not know his language, that speculation began to be busy with the question what he meant by the sin that should never be forgiven?

The outcome of this inquiry into the Talmudic use of the phrase has been to convince me that the supposed unpardonable sin (or, rather, the supposed fact that the sin against the Holy Spirit is unpardonable) is a mere theological nightmare, which has no real existence either in the facts of human nature or in the sight of God. It is not a fearful mystery, haunting the troubled soul, to be shunned in thought and only looked at from time to time with frightened eyes. It is just a fiction, created by a misunderstanding of the words of Jesus on the part of readers who did not speak his language and who only had his words in a translation or in a second translation from that.

If this suggested explanation be admitted, then it takes away the one difficulty in understanding what Jesus really taught about forgiveness of sin, since it removes the one exception to the doctrine that God forgives all who repent when they repent. Moreover, in the passage where the phrase occurs, the suggested explanation throws all the emphasis upon the gravity of the sin against the Holy Spirit, and does not send the reader off upon speculations as to its mysterious nature. It brings out the real meaning of that sin, as one of which it is possible for ordinary people to be guilty; the sin, namely, of disowning and reviling that which, in one's heart, one knows to be good. That is what Jesus was denouncing; and, by using the phrase "hath never forgiveness," he meant to say that it was the greatest wickedness of which a man could be guilty; he did not mean to say (and in fact did not say) anything about the way in which God would deal with such a sinner, either in this world or in the world to come. On the lines of this explanation, the sin against the Holy Spirit is seen in its true character; while the doctrine of an unpardonable sin is demolished.

"LIBERTY OF EXPRESSION."

SIR,—May I be allowed space in your columns to express my deep regret at the closing of the correspondence on Manchester College?

I have been reading the letters from students with great interest. It is always a privilege to hear genuine expressions of opinion derived from actual experience, and I was delighted that THE INQUIRER should be open-minded enough to give space in its columns to these opinions.

And now we are to hear no more, because there are only "further letters" "written by the students themselves." They may not represent "the lay mind" or "mature judgment," but they do give us valuable insight into the life at Manchester College.

As a teacher I have always been advised to respect the opinions of my pupils, however young; and now I plead that we should respect and welcome the opinions of the students at Manchester College, even though they may be lacking in "wide knowledge" and "special educational experience."—Yours, &c.,

M. R. JONES.

[We think that our correspondent is a little unfair in her comment. We value liberty of expression very highly, and hope to guard its rights very jealously at all times in our columns. In the case referred to we thought that the correspondence had exhausted its usefulness and interest on the lines on which it was being conducted, and was tending to run off into a personal discussion among a small group. In such circumstances it is not unusual for an editor to intervene for the sake of his readers and other public interests which he tries to serve.—ED. OF INQ.]

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

DR. DRUMMOND'S INTERPRETATION OF ST. PAUL.

Paul: His Life and Teaching. By JAMES DRUMMOND, LL.D. Sunday School Association. 1s. 6d. net.

DR. DRUMMOND has once more lengthened the list of our obligations to his scholarly guidance in New Testament study. On this occasion a special value attaches to his work, because it is a striking example of the way in which a great labour of learning, already embodied in larger volumes, can at need deliver up its leading principles and methods of interpretation in a reduced and simple form. The book on Paul is not, of course, for quite young people or for ordinary Sunday-school classes. As the preface says, it is intended to bring home to teachers and elder scholars some of the Apostle's lofty spiritual ideas, and is "adapted only to classes which have reached some maturity of thought and religious experience." Even to more advanced readers it will be a great pleasure to find the main lines of Dr. Drummond's view of Paul, which they have been accustomed to behold emerging with powerful impressiveness from the mass of erudite and detailed examination of knotty points, here stripped of everything except the grand, bold features in which the Pauline evangel presents itself to our modern interpreter. And there must be many an earnest inquirer who comes new to such subjects who would like to slip the little volume into his pocket for tram and railway reading. The well-known lucid style, always apt to its subject and often rising into fervent and powerful eloquence, might well make the book one of those companions to the inner life, in which thoughtful minds find food for the intellect, and at the same time kindling for the spirit.

It is indeed on this side—in its stimulation of the mind to spiritual moods and dispositions, even when occupied with intellectual inquiry—that Dr. Drummond's treatment of Paulinism is most helpful. What a heavy cloud of crabbed and fuliginous controversy must the very word Paulinism call up to the imaginations of most men. How they must shun any invitation to enter upon that dread field whence every Christian century has drawn its perplexities, and in which every obscurantist has found his account. And apart from factitious difficulties, the subject of Paul's meaning is often really one that requires close and patient thought; and after all that has been done for it, the end is not yet. But Dr. Drummond takes hold of the matter on the side which is at once most accessible and most fruitful. Whatever may have been Paul's precise conception at many points of his world-view, there is no doubt that religious and ethical motives dominated his thinking; and therefore we cannot be wrong in emphasising, with Dr. Drummond, the spiritual and affectional aims which were always present, even when he was most eagerly engrossed in an argument. It is to find this essential religion in Paul that men will go to him more and more in the future, when his peculiar thought-forms have lost their intrinsic value for our thinking. But in order to do this we shall still have to try to understand those thought-forms, and it is here that Dr. Drummond will be found to have done the work of a road-maker, clearing away so many traditional interpretations that have obstructed the path, and letting in a flood of light that will come to many as the dawn of a new day. Thousands of people still see the ghosts of Calvinism and of the mediæval scholastics, and of the Nicene orthodoxy, brooding like an incubus over many a Pauline text, where a few words from Dr. Drummond's ripe knowledge would dissolve the whole mischievous misunderstanding. The text Phil. ii. 6-11 is a case in point. It does not need much learning to see that anyone who can disengage the profound insight of a thinker from the harsh constructions placed on his words by system-makers, and can also penetrate to the universal truth which lies concealed under a dialect of the spirit's language that has long passed out of use, is conferring an immense boon upon religion. It is on this account that we must ever be grateful for Dr. Drummond's peculiar combination of religious and intellectual gifts. Even when the result of his examination of Paul's thought leaves us, as sometimes it must, in a negative frame of mind, or in one of suspense, it is still a good thing to have seen that the orthodox interpretations are not unshakable, and are in any case not the only possible ways of understanding the writer.

On some points it is, perhaps, difficult to think that the accepted ways of taking St. Paul are so much astray as Dr. Drummond believes. A great deal of explaining away, e.g., would be necessary to make Col. i. 15-20 a natural mode of expression to a man who did not regard Christ as the divine instrument of creation. On the other hand, Dr. Drummond's freedom from traditional and slipshod renderings enables him to make short work of the notion, of which there has been a recent recrudescence, that Paul did not know, or care to know, anything of the earthly life of Jesus. And whatever our individual conclusions may be, our delight increases with every fresh illustration of perfectly frank and independent criticism, which every page affords, together with the devout aim which breathes through all.

THE PROGRESS OF POETRY.

Lectures on Poetry. By J. W. Mackail. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 10s. 6d. net.

POETRY, even more than theology, is the handmaid of religion. The great poets speak to the soul with a more intimate voice than the defenders of the faith. It is, perhaps, chiefly a matter of atmosphere, of right feeling about the best things, which is a deeper spiritual need than right thinking. In any case, we are not ashamed to confess that we expect more enlightenment of soul from a writer who woos us to fresh enjoyment of the world's great poetry than from most of our theological mentors. But perhaps we ought not to speak of Mr. Mackail's new volume in this way, lest we leave the impression that he is simply using poetry as an opportunity for moralising, or that he is specially concerned with the poets of spiritual passion. This is very far from being the case. Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare, Keats, are among his chosen themes, while other lectures are concerned with the "Definition of Poetry," "Poetry and Life," "Imagination," and the "Progress of Poetry." To many readers the two lectures on Arab lyric poetry and Arabian epic and romantic poetry will be the most attractive, with their glimpse into a strange wonderland of strong and clear emotion.

There is much illuminating criticism in the attempt to define the nature of poetry and to seize its essential qualities. Though Mr. Mackail cannot add much to the rich pictorial phrases like Wordsworth's "Poetry is the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge; it is the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all science"; or Shelley's "Poetry lifts the veil from the hidden beauty of the world, and makes familiar objects be as if they were not familiar"; he has done a distinct service in reminding us that poetry has a formal quality as an art as well as an essential quality in relation to life. "Poetry," he says, "while in its essence it is a function of life and as indefinable as life itself, except through imagination expressing itself in symbols and metaphors, is formally and technically patterned language: the technical issue of pattern is repeat: and where there is no repeat, there is technically no poetry." The phrase which he uses here—"poetry, a function of life"—is very characteristic of Mr. Mackail's whole point of view. Poetry is to him a spirit or movement of life which is continually reaching forward towards a new embodiment. "Poetry ranges in its progress over all the immense scale of existence. The image of perfection which it condenses from the flying vapours of the world, fades, dissolves, is re-condensed, over and over again. It never continues in one stay. Movement is the condition of its being." Here we have the ancient doctrine of Heraclitus applied to poetical theory, and the reader will see at once how closely akin it is to the vitalism, if for a moment we may descend into the ugly language of philosophy, which is the most characteristic feature of a great deal of current speculation.

It is this doctrine which enables Mr. Mackail to brush aside all dismal forebodings of the decadence of poetry and to speak with confidence of the future. He holds truly that it is only because the spirit of poetry is alive in us that we can appreciate the poetry of the past. "If the art of the living poet became extinct, the poetry of past ages would become dead art." He maintains that the popular idea that poetry and criticism are hostile to one another is a delusion. "It is nearer the truth to say that when poetry is at a low vitality, poetical criticism also tends to lower its lights, to stiffen and become mechanical."

"We are too apt to forget," he says, "that nearly all the great poets of the past reached, in their own time, but a small audience, and often met with neglect where they did not meet with abuse. The decay of poetry, like the degeneration of mankind, is one of those illusions which seem eternal and unconquerable. . . . Again and again, as we shall find if we take the pains to look, the cry over the decay of poetry has been raised most piercingly when poetry was in point of fact taking a new advance, achieving a new perfection, opening out a new world; not in times of decay, but in times of germination, or even of full flower."

We are not quite convinced that this is a full statement of the case. The difficulty is to see things in their wholeness, as rooted and grounded in a Divine Life of love and order and peace, when the intellect for its own purposes of analysis and classification insists upon examining them in their distinctness, and is more concerned to trace their growth than to feel their power. Temperamentally certain periods appear to belong more to the critical than to the creative forces of the soul. But it is only for a season. Criticism ends in the conviction of its own ignorance. Life recovers the sense of an unfathomed mystery. The lips confess that the best things are beyond human prediction or control—"the Spirit bloweth where it listeth." It is in the world's marvelling hours that great poetry is born.

MR. BARROW'S SERMONS.

The Way not a Sect, and other Sermons. By the late Rev. E. P. Barrow. London: J. M. Dent & Sons. 4s. 6d. net.

THIS book will be valued by many as a personal reminiscence, enshrining, as it does, in page after page, the very tones of a voice that is still. To others to whom Mr. Barrow was not much more than a name, or perhaps not even that, it will be a revelation, not unmingled with regret that a spirit of such fine quality, so sure in its spiritual insight, so beautiful in expression, spoke in his later days to only a small company of people, and never received any of the prizes of popularity, which in our strange religious world go as a rule to men of commoner mould. The author of these sermons had a most sensitive and fastidious dislike of anything like self-display or advertisement in the offices of religion, and it may have been an instinctive compliance with this feeling which has led those who are responsible for the publication of this volume to issue it without so much as a prefatory note. Of the contents it is impossible to speak too highly. The spiritual teaching is not of the kind which plays upon the surface of contemporary problems, but goes to the root of moral need and religious affection; while the language has the directness and simplicity without a trace of intellectual jargon which are supreme virtues in the pulpit.

Though Mr. Barrow resigned his post of service in the Church of England in obedience to a strong leading of conscience he always remained a broad churchman. He never lost the sense of spiritual continuity and a catholic fellowship, which leaves no place in the heart for sectarianism. In a sermon preached in the ancestral home of Manchester Nonconformity he spoke as follows:—

“We too have a national Church, an ancestral worship. As the Apostle could say that he was a Pharisee, so we may say that we are Churchmen. We too have our law and our prophets to interpret and to keep. Scriptures and liturgies are part of our inheritance. We think, we feel, we worship, we serve the God of our fathers, after a way which we, at least, will not call a sect. Bear with me if I say that the day of sectarian leadership is over. No group of churches, be they ever so free, can arrogate to themselves the enfranchisement of the national faith. Men of science, men of letters, the Press, the Legislature, the drift of public opinion, do more for religious liberty than any sect can now hope to do. There is a movement on every side towards a simpler creed, a closer unity, a new conception of the Church as the expression of the public conscience, the Church of the Commonwealth.”

One other quotation we must give because it illustrates a pervading and most characteristic quality of these sermons, their moral passion, their plainness of speech in enforcing moral lessons, and the conviction that the battle with sin is far more the preacher's business than the battle of the creeds.

“Let us not imagine that we are called, or that sinful men and women are calling to us, to emancipate them from creeds and dogmas. I do not suppose that one in a hundred passes through any agony of mind or soul on account of any creed. But they do pass through the fires of temptation—none fiercer than those of anger and of lust. They are tied and bound with the chain, not of doctrine, but of sin, coarse tastes, evil habits, vile associations. They want to be taught not how to think, but how to feel. Out of the heart, not out of the head, proceed drunken brawls, scandalous quarrels, cruelty to women, to children, to animals, tyrannies by day, infamies by night, the hideous forms which are led by murder on the right hand, adultery on the left. If our churches are grappling with these foes, let us bid them God speed, and give them all the help we can; if not, let us warn them that they are missing their mark, fighting with shadows, beating the air, spending their strength for nought. As an unsparing critic has lately said, ‘A religion which cannot convert sinners is a somewhat useless religion.’”

It will be no small benefit if this volume helps the churches in whose service Mr. Barrow spent the last years of his ministry to realise the deep truth of these words.

INDIAN MEMORIES.

Indian and Home Memories. By Sir Henry Cotton, K.C.S.I. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

SIR HENRY COTTON has published his Memories at an opportune moment. A few years ago they would have been met with the derision or the official boycott from which the author himself suffered when he spoke true things before their time. Even now it is with something akin to amazement that most people see a former official of high rank appointed with popular acclamation to the presidency of the National Indian Congress, and finding congenial friends among members of the Labour Party or the most advanced groups of Liberal politicians. But in the case of Sir Henry Cotton there was something in his training and temperament which saved him from the hardening of temper and the obliquity of vision, which are the besetting dangers of a small official group living among a vast alien population. To most of his friends his sympathies with native aspirations and his opposition to the traditional preferential treatment for the Englishman marked him as a traitor to his country and his order, and they treated him accordingly. Many personal estrangements followed as a matter of course. His brilliant career was brought to a close when he held the important post of Chief Commissioner in Assam owing to his strenuous attempt to improve the conditions of indentured coolie labour on the tea plantations and a hopeless quarrel with Lord Curzon. All this makes chapters of the book the record of acute and often painful controversy. The author suppresses nothing, and writes about friends and foes alike with a candour, and an instinct for personal detail, which are half humorous and half satirical. He justifies it all with a motto from Montaigne, c'est icy un livre de bonne foy, lecteur; but there are passages here and there which we think would have been better away, especially if he desires to win the unwilling convert to sympathy with Indian reforms.

We have referred to these matters because people with Anglo-Indian connections will seize upon them at once, and not improbably refuse to have anything to do with a book which treats their accepted standards of judgment so irreverently. But the book itself is much more than a piece of self-justification or a plea for wider political sympathies. It contains one of the best pictures we know of the life of the administrator in India. It is full of thrilling adventures and capital stories and clever pen-portraits of all sorts of important people in India and at home. Sir Henry Cotton's relations with educated Indians were particularly happy, and he pays many warm tributes to his friends in Bengal. Before he went out he had abandoned the evangelical creed of his childhood and become a Positivist and a warm friend of Dr. Congreve. No doubt this helped to quicken his sympathetic insight into the native mind, and his interest in the Brahmo Samaj and other higher developments of religious life. He speaks of the death of Keshub Chunder Sen in 1884 as one of the earliest occasions for the manifestation of a truly national sentiment in the country. His belief in the benefit which India will reap from the growth of this national sentiment is unswerving, and he traces most of the bad blunders of the past to the persistent habit of ignoring it or viewing it with dislike. In an epilogue written last autumn he expresses hopes which have reached already a larger measure of fulfilment than is the fate of most political dreams.

“A real occasion of national rejoicing is approaching. Expectations are again strung high, and popular sentiment is again deeply moved. Another golden opportunity presents itself to those who are ready and willing to grasp the olive-branch of peace. There could be no more fitting attribution to the Coronation of His Majesty the King-Emperor at Delhi than the redress of grievances, above all a modification of the Partition of Bengal, and a general amnesty of political offenders. If the King's Proclamation breathes a new spirit in official policy and infuses a new hope and new life among the people, all will be well. Then, indeed, would fly away ‘Anarchy’ and ‘Conspiracy,’ the birds of evil omen, and panic-mongers would die a natural death. And then would at last be fulfilled the prophetic words of Queen Victoria in her gracious Proclamation to her Indian subjects more than fifty-three years ago: ‘In their Prosperity will be our Strength; in their Contentment our Security; and in their Gratitude our best Reward.’”

THE WIFE IN ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES. By E. J. Schuster. London: Williams & Norgate. 4s. 6d. net.

MR. ERNEST SCHUSTER has written a book which will be read and valued by all who are interested in the Feminist movement of to-day. The first part is historical, and sketches the position of the wife from early Old Testament times, down through Grecian and Roman civilization to our own day. In dealing with the Church and Canon Law the author points out that the views on marriage expressed by Jesus “have ennobled the nature of the marriage tie among all civilized peoples. These views, however, have not always rightly been understood by the expounders of the Christian Religion.” The first sinner in this respect was the great Apostle to the Gentiles, who is commonly held responsible for much of the humiliation that numbers of women endure from the cradle to the grave. But is it not possible that Paul himself may have been unjustly dealt with in this matter, and that his advice about submission and silence applied only to women in the churches, and did not represent his views of what she should be outside the contentious atmosphere of the early Christian Church? In the later chapters of the book Mr. Schuster deals with her present-day position in European countries, and with the Divorce Laws. He writes in easy, graceful style, and throws a much needed light on many dark places in the history of the evolution of woman.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE Educational passages from the writings of Matthew Arnold have been gathered into a single volume, edited by Mr. Leonard Huxley, which will be published immediately by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. Matthew Arnold's unpublished Reports, as Inspector of Schools, have been laid under contribution as well as his published works.

SIR ALFRED WILLS has conferred a boon on the public by re-editing and bringing up to date the study of "The Principles of Circumstantial Evidence," by his father, the late Mr. William Wills, which appeared first in 1838. The layman will read it chiefly for the pleasure and excitement of the famous trials and mysteries of which it tells. The new edition (the sixth) is published by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

THE same publishers also announce "The Life of Bishop Ernest Wilberforce," by J. B. Atlay. The third son of the famous Bishop of Oxford, and grandson of William Wilberforce, the emancipator of the slaves, Bishop Wilberforce was, like his father, called upon to rule two English dioceses in succession. He was a leader of the temperance movement, both in the pulpit and on the platform, and he was one of the clergy who went on the Mission of Help to South Africa after the war. The book contains an interesting selection from the Bishop's correspondence.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE will issue the fourth set of ten volumes of the Home University Library on January 24. They include two notable contributions to the historical section of the Library, "Rome," by Mr. W. Warde Fowler, M.A., and "The History of England: A Study in Political Evolution," by Prof. A. F. Pollard. The extremes of the Empire meet in volumes by Mr. A. G. Bradley on "Canada" and Sir Thomas W. Holderness, K.C.S.I., on "Peoples and Problems of India." The Hon. Bertrand Russell, F.R.S. discusses "The Problems of Philosophy"; and Mr. R. R. Marett, M.A., of Oxford, describes the principles, methods, and recent progress of "Anthropology." To the section of Literature and Art there are added volumes on "Landmarks in French Literature," by Mr. G. L. Strachey, and on "Architecture," by Prof. W. R. Lethaby, the latter illustrated. A book which will attract wide attention is

"The School: An Introduction to the Study of Education," by Prof. J. J. Findlay, M.A., Ph.D., of Manchester. Finally, Prof. H. N. Dickson, D.Sc., gives a popular exposition of the science of "Climate and Weather."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

CÆDMON THE COWHERD.

The First English Poet—Seventh Century.

"O sing unto the Lord a new song; for the Lord . . . helpeth the meek-hearted."

In learning history at school, do they teach you mostly about the kings and queens? Well, that is one way of learning it, and perhaps it makes it easier for you to remember the date when anything happened. But I want you to remember that kings and queens are not always, or even usually, the greatest people in history. There are many other people, often very little thought of in their own life-time, who were far greater than the kings and queens, and who ought to make us all proud of being English, and make us try to live as good lives as we can.

I am going to try to tell you about one of these great men and women who lived in England, and I will begin almost at the beginning of English history, when Saxon kings and queens reigned over the country (about 449-1066). In those days there were no schools for children to go to, and nobody except the monks and a few of the great nobles knew how to read or write. The monks were the people who wrote all the books, and painted all the pictures in them in gold and beautiful colours so well that some of them have lasted until now, and we can see what they were like. There was a great house for monks—a monastery, as it was called—and another for nuns (sisters of charity) high up on the top of the cliffs at Whitby, and a very wise and good abbess, called Hilda, ruled over them both. She built the abbey, whose ruins you can still see, and here the monks and nuns used to hold their services and say their prayers many times a day—often, I dare say, praying for the poor sailors and fishermen who were out on the sea in storms and in danger on that rocky coast. Among the servants of the Abbess Hilda there was a poor man called Cædmon, whose business it was to look after the cows. Listen how another poet* describes him:

"Humble he was of station, meek of soul, Unlettered, yet heart-wise. His face was pale,
Stately his frame, though slightly bent
by age,
Slow were his eyes, and slow his speech, and slow
His musing step, and slow his hand to wrath.
A massive hand, but soft, that many a time
Had succoured man and woman, child and beast,
And yet could fiercely grasp the sword."

Well, one evening, while Cædmon was watching the cattle near the abbey of Whitby, there was a sound of horses, and he saw a procession with torches riding up the steep path to the abbey. The King of Northumbria (you know England was divided into several kingdoms then), with several princes and learned monks, had come to see and talk with Hilda, for she was so wise and great that kings and princes travelled a long way to ask her advice and to hear her talk about sacred things. We can suppose that she talked about such things as these: She would warn them not to care whether they were rich and powerful and respected, and had more than they needed in the way of clothes and meat and drink, because real happiness and greatness did not depend on these things, but on being good, and loving God and their neighbour. In days, you see, when even kings and princes could not read books, as you and every child in England can now, they were grateful to whomsoever would tell them these things, and help them to live so that they might be ready to die at any moment—as we, too, ought to be. Only the people who lived in that time must have seemed to themselves nearer to death every day of their lives than we do, because, you see, there was so much fighting that they could hardly ride from one place to another without the danger of being attacked by their enemies and killed suddenly. When Hilda knew that these visitors had come she and her nuns made them a feast, for you may suppose that they were hungry after riding all day, and their servants and the servants of the abbey were feasted too.

Now it used to be the custom then, when so few people could read books to amuse themselves, to practise making and reciting or singing verses about the great deeds of the kings and knights, or any stories that were repeated by one person or another, until they came to be well known. And quite unlettered people would grow clever at this, so that after a feast or supper a harp would be brought in, and it would be passed round the table, and everybody would take it in turn to play and sing for the amusement of the rest. And this was what happened after the feast which the Abbess Hilda gave to her guests. Imagine a long tent set out on the sea shore, and in this tent all manner of poor folks sitting at supper. (The Abbess Hilda gave her feast to the king in the abbey at the top of the cliffs.) There would be fishermen, farmers, herdsmen, and horsemen and grooms that had ridden there with the king, and all the wives and daughters of these people, among them all Cædmon was sitting, without talking much, we may suppose, as we know that "Slow was his speech," and living with the cattle all day, far away from anyone, must have made him slower at talking than at thinking. When the harp was brought in, and it came to his turn to sing something, he pushed it away from him, saying, "I cannot sing." The others mocked him, and said he was growing as slow as the cows he took care of, but he got up and left the feast, and went home to the stable where he slept among the cattle. He may have felt vexed that the people mocked him, and that he was slower than the rest of them, but when he reached the stable and laid his head down on the soft coat of one of the cows he soon forgot all about it and went to sleep. In his sleep it seemed to him that Some One came and stood beside him, and called him by his name, and said "Cædmon, sing some song to me." "I cannot sing," he answered, "for this cause left I the feast and came hither." He who talked with him answered, "However that be, you shall sing to me." "What shall I sing?" asked Cædmon. "The beginning of created things," replied He, or, as the same poet says whose words I have quoted before,

"Cædmon, stand up, and sing thy song of God."

And all at once he was able to sing, and he sang of the creation of the world and of man, and of all the history of Israel; how the Israelites left Egypt and came to the Promised Land, and then of all that we are taught in the New Testament, of the birth and life of Christ, of his death and rising again from the dead, of the day of judgment and of the life after death. All this he sang in his dream, without knowing how it had come to him, and in the morning he told an old man who was his friend what had happened. The old man went and told it to the Abbess Hilda, and she commanded Cædmon to be brought before her. The two, Cædmon and his friend, climbed up the steep path to the abbey, and went into the great hall where Hilda was sitting surrounded by the princes and chiefs and monks and nuns and bishops. "Is this the man," she asked, "favoured with the gift of song?" as Cædmon knelt before her. "Then sing once more what thou heard'st in thy dream." Then Cædmon answered:

"Great mother, if that God who sent the song

Vouchsafe me to recall it, I will sing;
But I misdoubt it lost."

He stood for some time silently, his hands opening and shutting, for he was used to carrying a staff when he herded the cows, and now he was without it. Without thinking he stretched out his hand and took the staff (or crosier, as it is called) out of the hand of the bishop near Hilda, and when he had this to lean upon the words came to him again, and he sang the beginning of that song he had sung the night before. They were all astonished, and felt that this had come from God; and the Abbess Hilda translated for him some verses out of the Bible (it was only written in Latin then), and told him to see if he could make another song out of it. Cædmon answered her,

"A man am I,
Sluggish and slow, that needs must muse and brood.
Therefore those verses till the sun goes down
Will I revolve. If song from God be mine,
Expect me here at morn."

Next morning Cædmon again stood before the abbess, and sang "A second song, and worthier than his first."

And Hilda said, "From God it came, not man. Thou, therefore, live a monk among my monks, and sing to God." So Cædmon became a monk, and lived many years in the monastery. But you must not think that it made him proud to be among these learned men when he had only been a cowherd before. We are told that he was the "humblest of the monks," and very likely he never learnt to read or write, as he was getting old when he went into the monastery. Perhaps you wonder how we know anything about his poem, as he could only sing or recite it.* If you were to try to read it you would find it almost like another language. English has altered very much since then; and, indeed, people study it now as if it were a foreign tongue, and call it Anglo-Saxon, but for all that it was the beginning of our English. Afterwards came the Danes and the Normans, and through them and their descendants the English language was gradually altered into what we speak now. We do not know much about Cædmon's life after he became a monk, but we can imagine how he would pray for the sailors and the poor folk on land; how he would sing to those who asked him whenever he felt that God had put a song into his heart; how he would sometimes take his staff and wander away to the great cathedrals of York and Ripon; and how at last he died, at peace with all the world. The poet whose words I have read you before says of the days before his death:

"Weakness . . .
Increased upon him; he was cheerful still,
He still could pace, though slowly, in the sun,
Still gladsomely converse with friends who wept,
Still lay a broad hand on his well-loved kine."

We ought to be glad when we think of Cædmon, for his life shows us how the greatest and best things do not come only to those who are clever, or powerful, or rich, but that "The Lord helpeth the meek-hearted." Poetry, you know, is one of the greatest and best things in the world, because it is written by people who have heard God's voice in their hearts, and have felt that they must write down what they have heard to help the rest of the world to live better. If all the other countries of

* We may imagine that it was written down by one of the bystanders.

Europe were to ask England what was the greatest thing we had to show, what would you answer, railways, or coal mines, or big towns? No; these are not great things in the same way that poetry is great. If you were wise you would answer, as any great man would answer if he were asked—"Our poetry is our greatest thing." From Cædmon down to Shakespeare, and from Shakespeare down to Tennyson, there is no country except, perhaps, Germany, which has such great and beautiful poetry as ours. We ought to be glad to be English on this account, and it should make us glad also to think in what a beautiful way all our poetry began—with Cædmon, who was a poor man knowing nothing of books, but who spoke what God commanded him, and received the gift of song because he was meek-hearted, so that his name will always be remembered along with Shakespeare's and those of the very greatest Englishmen.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

LOWER MOSLEY STREET SCHOOLS.

Presentation to Mr. A. E. Steinthal.

WE are indebted to the Manchester Guardian for the following account of a pleasant little ceremony which took place last Saturday night at the Lower Mosley-street Schools, Manchester. Mr. A. Ernest Steinthal, who has been connected with the schools for forty years—first as a teacher, then as a superintendent, and for the last twenty-five years as honorary secretary of the evening classes—was presented with his portrait and an illuminated address. Scholars of all ages assembled to make the occasion memorable. A few of those present had a much older connection with the schools than even Mr. Steinthal. Mr. J. H. Reynolds, for one, recalled his record of sixty-one years' attachment to the schools, and others were singled out in the speeches for work done nearly half a century ago and still well remembered.

Mr. Reynolds made the presentation. He expressed the hope that such schools as those of Lower Mosley-street—schools with large adult as well as junior classes—would play the same part in the future as they had done in the past. He hoped they would, but he recognised that there were to-day so many distractions, and circumstances had changed so much, that it was very difficult to find cultivated people who were ready to interest themselves in their less fortunate fellows. In the days when well-to-do and educated people lived within a stone's-throw of the schools it was easy to bring together persons of all classes. But when people, perhaps naturally and properly, desired to live in the country, it was not so possible to bring the rich and the poor, the ignorant and the well educated, into association. Yet he felt that that was just what was needed in these times. We could not always go on with the rich on the one hand and the poor on the other far removed. The days must surely come when we should realise that we were "members one of another," and if the nation was to grow in happiness and power for good it must be because of the intermingling of all ranks and classes in order that the ideals of the best men might be maintained. (Applause.)

Mr. W. J. Flockton, who has been connected with the schools for nearly fifty years, and Herr Franke, the senior teacher of the evening classes, supported the presentation.

Mr. C. P. Scott said the evening classes, which had been under Mr. Steinthal's supervision, had been a wonderful contribution to the education of the city. It was fitting that they should honour a man whose work did not receive the reward of wide publicity but was essential to the maintenance of the vigorous life of the city. (Applause.)

Mr. Steinthal, in acknowledging the gifts, passed in review the memories of his early connection with the schools, recalling men and events that were as dear in recollection to his audience as to himself.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

An Appeal to the Christian Conscience of the Nation.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT, writing to the Secretary of the National Temperance League in the year 1884, said: "Unless the religious feeling of the country can be thoroughly enlisted in the cause, but little progress will be made." While a great change has undoubtedly taken place in the attitude of the churches towards the temperance movement, it can hardly be said that interest in it is as yet "thoroughly enlisted."

The chief hindrance to whole-hearted co-operation is a lack of the realisation on the part of Christian people of their own share in maintaining the drinking usages of society. The quite necessary attention paid to legislative temperance reform, which, however, but indirectly affects church-going people, has somewhat obscured the sense of personal responsibility.

We desire, on behalf of the National Temperance League, to earnestly appeal to all thoughtful people to consider the claims of "Young England" upon their protection against the most insidious enemy of our moral, mental, and physical stability. The abstinence now generally insisted on in the case of children, even in homes where the adults take alcohol, cannot be enforced upon them when they go out into life. Parental example then becomes a guiding factor.

The dangers of adolescence are sufficiently serious without being aggravated by the use of alcohol, the natural effect of which is to hinder growth and development, to pervert the moral nature, impair the mental processes, diminish and, in some cases, destroy the powers of resistance and control. We therefore confidently appeal, in the interests of the character and efficiency of our sons and daughters, who are the potential parents of the immediate future, for at any rate a study and consideration of the bearings of the alcohol problem upon this question, in the light of modern science.

J. W. LEIGH, DEAN OF HEREFORD,

SUMMER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, OXFORD, 1912.

A SUMMER School of Theology for men and women will be held at Oxford from July 22 to August 2, embracing about fifty lectures on the Philosophy of Religion, Old and New Testament, Church History and Comparative Religion. The lectures will be given in the Hall of Trinity College, by the kind permission of the President and Fellows. Among the lecturers will be Professors G. A. Cooke, Percy Gardner, J. A. Smith, W. R. Sorley, G. Milligan, J. H. Moulton, K. Lake (Leiden), N. Söderblom (Upsala), B. W. Bacon (Yale), the Principals of Mansfield and Manchester Colleges, the Rev. W. E. Addis, Dr. Vernon Bartlett, Professor W. H. Bennett, Dr. A. J. Carlyle, the Rev. R. T. Herford, Mr. R. R. Marett, Dr. James Moffat, Dr. J. E. Odgers, Professor John Oman, and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. The fee for the course will be £1. Detailed announcements will be issued later. The Rev. A. J. Carlyle and Principal J. Estlin Carpenter are acting as honorary secretaries.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE CHURCH AND INDUSTRIAL UNREST. AN OUTSPOKEN ADDRESS.

CANON PETER GREEN was the lecturer in the series of Deansgate lectures at Milton Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday evening last. He gave a striking address on the present industrial unrest which must have reminded some of his audience of Ruskin in his most uncompromising moments. The Manchester Guardian gave special prominence to it the next day. The workers, he said, felt that their hours were too long and their work too hard, that their share of the good things produced by their labour was too small, and that there was no security—the spectre of want was always present to their imagination. . . . Discontent among industrial workers was due partly to the fact that there had been a real fall in the exchange value of the things they produced. The workmen got less of the actual necessities of life in return for his work.

Turning to the question of remedies, Canon Green said, that the duty of the Church at the present day was to promulgate the Sermon on the Mount as a law binding on the consciences of all Christian people, and that this apparently commonplace counsel really meant drastic changes in our present civilisation which was based on principles that were the exact negation and contradiction of the Sermon on the Mount. It was morally certain, he continued, that strikes, unrest, discontent, and all the other symptoms now viewed with fear and concern must continue and be aggravated so long as the present condition of society obtained.

The duty of the Church was negatively to condemn the accumulation of wealth and positively to teach that a man's true wealth lay in the development and use of his powers of body, mind, and soul. Sooner or later the Church must totally excommunicate the rich—not the idle rich, but the man who possessed more than he could enjoy. . . . He believed that the Church would sooner or later have to endorse the principle that no one but an infant, an invalid, or an imbecile ought to receive any more service from others than they rendered to others. . . . The person who accepted more than he rendered in return must be excommunicated unless there was a reasonable excuse of infancy, weakness of body or mind, or age. And no man should be allowed to possess more than he could reasonably enjoy.

The Church, however, would effect nothing by merely negative denunciation of rich people. She must teach men where true wealth lay. All the things which really made for happiness in life were cheap. It was useless to declare that the poor were blessed, while every effort of their own lives was directed against avoiding poverty. It might be asked whether what he proposed was not just plain and undisguised socialism. He would rather describe it as such a change in the moral attitude of mankind to life as was a necessary preliminary to any successful socialism. Apart from such a change he saw no hope of better things at all. And if the Church could not effect such a change there would be a revolution of some sort in our national life. The social revolution might be peacefully and quietly effected, but the signs seemed to him to be against that possibility.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

DR. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., has been elected Lent Reader at the Middle Temple. This is, we understand, an office of great antiquity and distinction, but it has now no duties, and, what is still more sad, no emolument attached to it.

ON Thursday, January 25, in connection with the 82nd Anniversary of the Brahmo Samaj, a service in English will be conducted at Essex Hall at 5.30 by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. Invitations are being sent out for a social gathering on Friday, January 26, when the President (Sir K. G. Gupta, K.C.S.I.) and members of the Brahmo Samaj in London will be "At Home" at the Waldorf Hotel. There will be divine service in Bengali at the Emerson Club, 19, Buckingham-street, Strand, where a similar service is now being held on Sundays, at 11 o'clock on Sunday, January 28. The Hon. Secretary is Mr. S. C. Mukerjee, 51, Cornwall Gardens, S.W.

THE Rev. F. Summers writes as follows: "Will you please allow me to inform the many friends of the (London) George's Row Domestic Mission that the name of the street has now been altered by the London County Council. In future the address will be, Domestic Mission, Dingley-place, St. Luke's, E.C.

THE programme of the winter meetings of the Quest Society on Thursday evenings, beginning January 16 and ending March 28, contains the interesting announcement of a lecture by Mr. W. B. Yeats on February 1, on "Dreams and Apparitions." Mr. Ezra Pound, whose name will be familiar to readers of contemporary poetry, will lecture on February 29 on "The Psychology of the Troubadours." Guests' tickets may be obtained from members or from the hon. secretary, Mr. E. T. Sturdy, 16, Selwood-place, Onslow-gardens, S.W. The lectures will be given at the Kensington Town Hall at 8.30 p.m.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Birmingham: Old Meeting Church.—On Sunday, January 14, the Rev. Joseph Wood gave notice of his intended retirement from the active ministry of the Old Meeting Church. In making this announcement, Mr. Wood said that owing to precarious health and advancing years he no longer found himself equal to the duties of that important position, but felt it to be his duty to make way for a younger and a more vigorous man. During the last four years his health had so frequently failed him that a good deal of ministerial work had been interfered with. Then on entering his 70th year he was conscious of the warning given him by the almanac, and by the gathering shadows of eventide. His resignation will take effect on the last Sunday in July.

Boiton: Bank-street Sunday School.—A pleasant gathering was held in the Bank-street School on Saturday, January 13, to celebrate the completion of a building scheme which has been carried out during the past six months. The school, which has been in use since 1874, was not in many ways suitable to modern requirements, and extensive alterations have been made. These consist principally of an entrance-hall, cloak-rooms, a useful corridor, and a wide stone staircase from the gallery to the basement, together with additional class-room accommodation. The alterations have been carried out by Mr. R. J. Tyson, under the supervision of the architects. The congregation, scholars, and friends met under the chairmanship of Mr. Thos. Harwood, the senior superintendent, to inaugurate the opening of the added portion, and speeches appropriate to the occasion were made by the superintendents and friends of the school. There were about 500 persons present.

Bournemouth: West Hill-road Church.—As the year 1912 brings the 250th anniversary of the Act of Uniformity, the Rev. V. D. Davis proposes to give later in the year a series of special addresses on the history of Nonconformity. During February he will give four addresses on "Developments of Christian Doctrine." Mr. Davis has sent his usual New Year's letter to members of the congregation, at the same time enclosing some passages from a sermon on "The Fellowship of our Church," preached by him on December 17. In the course of the sermon, Mr. Davis said, "It is a happy thing that we are permitted to come together here in the fellowship of our Church, with the common purpose of worship and thanksgiving, and with the confession to one another, simply by our presence here, that we recognise the deeper meanings of life and want to understand more fully, that we feel the need of help, and desire to be brave and true, and give ourselves to the service of high ends according to the will and purpose of the Highest. . . The Church simply does not exist except where there are people. It lives only as they are alive, and according to the measure of their faithfulness. We come together and ourselves make the Church: and we can do that because it is never ourselves alone. It is we, with all our needs, our earnest desires and aspirations, and God with us, the Giver of all good. All we have is His and it is His Church. But we have to come and to give, with that other unseen Presence in our midst and in our hearts, to make the Church and its power of helpfulness. That is possible, because our Father has called us to life, and our spirit can be surrendered to His. So as each one comes, and more and more come together bringing their gifts—gifts of earnest purpose, of sincere desire, of gladness in worship, of kindling sympathy—the spirit of communion is strengthened, the Church is there, with growing power; hearts uplifted in true aspiration know the strength of the Eternal and the joy of the hidden fellowship."

Chatham.—The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman has resigned the pulpit of the Hammond Hill Church. The resignation has been received by the members of the Church Committee and the congregation with deep regret. The financial position, however, for reasons quite beyond the control of the minister, has become difficult and precarious, and it has seemed wise in all the circumstances to relieve the congregation of the strain. During Mr. Whiteman's ministry the religious and social work has been carried on with energy and success, and it is the earnest hope of his friends in Chatham that he may soon find another sphere of work.

Hampstead.—An entertainment was given last Monday afternoon in the Rosslyn-hill Chapel hall, when the members of the mothers' meetings at the George's-row, Bell-street, Rhyl-street, and Mansford-street missions were invited to witness a dramatic performance by the Hampstead Hospital Fairies and the Children's League of Pity, under the management of Mrs. E. F. Grundy and Mrs. Hickson. During an interval tea was taken round by a large party of helpers, and the hearty thanks of the guests was expressed by the Revs. F. Summers and W. H. Rose, and Mrs. Farley.

Islington: Unity Church.—During the Sunday evenings of this month Dr. Tudor Jones is delivering a series of addresses upon "The Poet Browning as a Teacher of Religion," based upon Sir Henry Jones's book. The Sunday Scholars' New Year parties took place on Thursday, January 4, and Friday, January 5, when the children acted an operetta, and gifts were distributed from a Christmas-tree which Lady Durning-Lawrence had kindly sent. The Young People's Society have also held a Christmas fancy-dress soirée, and the Unity Branch of the Women's League their New Year open evening on January 9, when a dramatic sketch was performed.

Kilburn: Quex-road.—A delightful entertainment was given on Saturday, January 13, in Unity Hall by the children of the congregation, who invited a number of friends to afternoon tea, which was followed by musical items and a fairy play, to help to pay for a Christmas party for the mothers' meeting. All the performers were young, some very small indeed, and their songs, recitations and dances were much appreciated by the audience which filled the hall. The mothers' meeting now numbers 75, and it is much to be regretted that the list cannot be extended owing to the want of more space and accommodation, for such helpful agencies bring a great deal of brightness into the lives of many hard-working women in poor and over-populated districts like Kilburn. The various clubs and societies in connection with Mr. Roper's church are all in a flourishing condition, and the Sunday school, which was only started two years ago, is doing excellent work. There are 140 scholars, the average attendance at the present time being over a hundred. This is encouraging when the fact is taken into account that in such a poor neighbourhood many children are so badly shod that they cannot go to school in bad weather. As soon as the scholars are old enough they are invited to join the clubs, which are run on a strictly non-sectarian basis. The girls' club membership is now nearly seventy, while the boys' is nearly sixty.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—The Rev. Charles Hargrove, preaching on Sunday, January 14, from the text "No man putteth new wine into old bottles," dealt with the problems raised by the development of a freer religious spirit which is at work in all the churches. He showed how Jesus tried to reform Judaism from within, as many other religious reformers have tried to do with other religions, but this was found to be impossible. The new wine must have new vessels to contain it, or else be lost. Every forward movement required room to develop. It was so with Methodism, in spite of Wesley's desire to carry on his work within the national Church, for which he had so great a reverence. Mr. Hargrove also referred to the Modernist movement against which the Church of Rome is vainly trying to guard itself; to the religious outlook in Prussia, where Pastor Jatho, of Cologne, has been condemned for heresy and deprived of his church; and to the liberalising tendencies at work in the Anglican Church, with which Mrs. Humphry Ward has made the novel-reading public familiar in her latest story, "The Case of Richard Meynell."

London: Domestic Mission, Dingley-place (late George's-row).—On Saturday evening, January 13, a successful soirée, inaugurated and carried out by Mrs. Summers and Mrs. Carlier, was held at the Domestic Mission. There was a large attendance, and a sum of £6 13s. was realised in aid of the fund for the repair of the organ.

Melbourne (Australia).—The Rev. W. Wooding, accompanied by his wife and daughter, recently visited Melbourne on their way to New Zealand. During their stay (November 29 to December 6) they were entertained by Mr. H. Gyles Turner at his home, Bundalohn, St. Kilda. The week was a very full one, and the social events began on the day of the arrival of the visitors, when Mr. Turner invited the minister, the Rev. Chas. Read, and officers to dinner with Mr., Mrs. and Miss Wooding. The next evening a welcome meeting was held, at which Mrs. Wooding read a letter of kindly greetings and remembrances from the Rev. Charles Hargrove, which was responded to by Mr. Larard, chairman of the church committee. On the following day, at the invitation of the Rev. Dr. Strong, Mr. Wooding and Mr. Read joined a party which had been arranged to visit Pentridge, the convict prison of the State of Victoria. Mr. Wooding preached on Sunday morning, his subject being "The Secret of Righteousness." In the evening he gave a lecture on "Religious Changes I have Seen," and on Tuesday evening another lecture, entitled "Reminiscences of Life in an English Village."

Plymouth: Appointment.—The Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Loughborough, has accepted a cordial invitation to the Treville-street Unitarian Church, and expects to begin his ministry there in February.

Whitchurch, Salop.—Mr. Fred Maddison visited Whitchurch under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association last Sunday evening. On the Monday evening he gave a public lecture on "Lessons from the Life of John Bright."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

"ROBBING GOD."

In view of the present discussion on dis-establishment, Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has issued a very timely pamphlet at the price of 1d. entitled "Robbing God." It consists of a reprint of a chapter from Dr. Augustus Jessopp's well-known book "Before the Great Pillage" which was published in 1901. Dr. Jessopp points out how indefensible the phrase is from the historical point of view. "To this hour," he says, "such of our colleges and schools as date back to pre-Reformation days derive large portions of their incomes from Church lands and tithes which for ages had been devoted exclusively to the support of the ministers of the sanctuary. The process has always been going on. Are we now going to denounce the principle which has guided our course for well-nigh a thousand years as sacrilege? Can we seriously pretend that all these successive diversions of Church property deserved to be stigmatised as robbery?"

Dr. Jessopp goes on to show that a great change has come over the universities, which may be thought a change for the better or worse according to different points of view. "Fifty years ago there were twenty-four professors in the University of Cambridge, of whom five only were laymen. There are now forty professors, of whom, excluding the professors of Divinity, only three are in Holy Orders; while at Oxford, of the forty-eight professors, excluding the professors of Divinity, again only three are clergymen. . . . The leaders in thought and culture, in mathematical and physical science, in history, economics, linguistics, even in classical learning—the leaders of literature in its widest acceptance—are no longer to be found among the ordained clergy of the Church of England but outside their ranks. One fact alone may serve as a most startling confirmation of these assertions. In 1843 there were ninety Fellows of the Royal Society who were in Holy Orders. In 1893 the names of no more than sixteen clergymen of the Established Church are to be found in the roll-call of England's most illustrious brotherhood."

The pamphlet concludes with the following passage:—"Base the title of the Established Church to her endowments upon considerations of the highest political expediency, and you choose ground from which it will be difficult to be dislodged. Appeal to the gratitude of our countrymen, and teach them what the Anglican clergy have been and have done for their ancestors and their fatherland in the past, and you will not appeal in vain. Nay, appeal to the hopes and fears of the future if you will, and, rightly instructed, the nation will no longer surrender themselves to those who would 'make a desert and call it peace.' But beware how you rashly and stubbornly insist that the formulæ, the ritual, the discipline, the general regimen of the Church as by law established, are each and all equally and indubitably of Divine origin, and that to alienate one jot or tittle of her property is to 'rob God!'"

A HIDDEN CATHEDRAL.

The suggestion, referred to in this column recently, that the warehouses and other buildings blocking the view of Southwark Cathedral from the river should be swept away, to make room for an embankment and public garden, is warmly endorsed by the Bishop of Southwark, and a committee has been formed for the purpose of considering the matter. The question of cost is, of course, an important one, but it will be gone into thoroughly by the committee at the outset. The Bishop of Southwark emphasised in his letter to The Times the need of open spaces in the vicinity of the Cathedral. "Everyone admits," he says, "that no part of South London needs such an outlet more urgently than the Borough and its neighbourhood."

THE BRENT VALLEY BIRD SANCTUARY.

Mr. W. M. Webb, honorary general secretary of the Selborne Society, and chairman of the Brent Valley Bird Sanctuary, has written to the Press as follows:—"The cold snap suggests my asking your kind permission to remind your readers that during hard weather we feed the birds in the Brent Valley Bird Sanctuary. For this purpose we should be very glad of subscriptions, as well as towards the upkeep of the wood and the wages of the keeper. May I take the present opportunity of saying also that we are introducing a new series of simple feeding trays and bird tables, which will be on view at the offices of the Selborne Society, 42, Bloomsbury-square, W.C. (entrance in Vernon-place), during the coming week? It is advantageous if the nesting sites are put into position in gardens as soon as possible while the birds are coming for food, so that they may get used to them. I would add that I should be most happy to give any advice and help in my power to bird lovers who may care to communicate with me."

A TRIUMPH FOR TEMPERANCE REFORM AT LETCHWORTH.

Mr. Alexander Thompson, Parliamentary agent of the United Kingdom Alliance, has given some interesting details of the Letchworth poll in regard to the proposal to create a public-house at the Garden City, in a letter to the Daily News. He found, on visiting Letchworth, that "support was being given to the proposal for a public-house by people who, although not drinkers of intoxicants themselves, have the idea that it would be better to have them consumed in the public-house, than distributed from house to house by brewers' vans. Others were in favour of establishing a public-house in the centre of the town to relieve the pressure on the public-houses on the outskirts. A third section were fascinated with the idea of having a fancy public-house run on the lines of the Trust houses. When these points of view are taken into consideration, the victory for non-licence is seen to be even greater than it appears, and even more discouraging to the brewers, because these people were entirely opposed to the liquor trade as such."

* * *

"The most interesting feature of the polling," adds Mr. Thompson, "was the co-operation of men of all political parties and religious denominations. I found the Church of England clergymen and the Catholic priest working most heartily with Nonconformist ministers and laymen. The advocates of local option have always predicted that one of the great advantages of local option would be to eliminate party politics and sectarian differences, and to unite the electors of all creeds and parties in their several localities on the one simple question as to whether they should have public-houses or do without them. Yesterday this prediction was fulfilled. The sooner, therefore, the whole of our people are armed with the power which was exercised by an enlightened citizenship at Letchworth yesterday, the sooner will there be in each locality a clear-cut, non-party, non-sectarian, but vitally important issue with regard to the drink problem on which all good citizens can unite—viz., shall we or shall we not retain in our locality the prolific source of crime, vice, disease, and immorality?"

MARK TWAIN AND JOAN OF ARC.

In the first chapter of the Life of Mark Twain from the pen of Mr. A. Bigelow Paine, which has been commenced in Harper's Magazine, an incident, seemingly trifling, is narrated which shows how the imagination of the American humorist was stirred by the history of the heroine of France in his boyhood. "He was on his way from the office to his home when he saw flying along the pavement a square of paper, a leaf from a book. . . . He caught the flying scrap and examined it. It was a leaf from some history of Joan of Arc. . . . He had never heard of the subject before. He had never read any history. Now, however, there arose within him a deep compassion for the gentle Maid of Orleans, a burning resentment towards her captors, a powerful and indestructible interest in her sad history. It was an interest that would grow steadily for more than half a lifetime, and culminate at last in that crowning work, the Recollections, the loveliest story ever told of that martyred girl."

The Writing on the Wall

If you are dissatisfied with your present work, your present rate of pay, if you want to improve your position, then "The Writing on the Wall" means something for you; but without investigation you will not be a step further towards materialising your ideals.

When in competition for a good job the battle is half won if you are an I.C.S. man. The simple fact that you have had an I.C.S. training tells employers that you know your business technically, theoretically, practically. I.C.S. men have their heads in their work—and employers know it.

Example:—

"At my first interview with the Manager I informed him I was a student of the I.C.S. and he replied: 'Yes, you mentioned that fact in your letter or you would not be here now'; which clearly shows the value of C.I.S. training."

(Signed) D. J. BETHELL, Nottingham.

Salary Increased 100 per cent.

"It gives me great pleasure to thank you for your kindness in obtaining for me a position. I applied to your Students' Aid Department, with the result that in a very short time you obtained for me a position carrying with it an increase of 100 per cent. in wages."

(Signed) H. ELTON, Royton, Lancs.

Let us refer you to I.C.S. students in your district.

When a man is I.C.S. trained he has become a master of his work, and he wants the best possible price for his brains and skill. In this connection the value of the work of the I.C.S. Students' Aid Department, acting hand-in-hand with over 1,000 personal representatives all over the United Kingdom and throughout the Colonies, cannot be over-estimated.

During twelve months the average increase of earnings reported by I.C.S. students reached the remarkable figure of 54 per cent. in Great Britain alone!

The I.C.S. will train you without interruption to your daily work at a cost to suit your pocket. All books free. No classes to attend. No restrictions, no extras. All preliminary information given free.

PAUL

His Life and Teaching.

By JAMES DRUMMOND,

M.A., LL.D., Hon. D.Litt., D.D.

Cloth 1/6 net. Postage 3d.

This little volume is intended to introduce teachers and elder scholars in Sunday Schools to the writings and teachings of the Apostle Paul, and especially to bring home some of his lofty spiritual ideas to their hearts and minds. . . . It is adapted only to classes which have reached some maturity of thought and religious experience. Though there are chapters in the Epistles which may benefit a child, the discussions contained in them can, as a rule, appeal only to adults. Among these discussions I have endeavoured to select those which express most clearly the religious principles which ought to guide our daily conduct.—From Preface.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON Tuesday, Lord Grey was presented with the freedom of the City of London in recognition of his distinguished services as Governor-General of Canada. The speech which he made in reply was marked by an unusual breadth of political vision, and a spirit of confident optimism. "The day," he said, "is approaching when Canadians will be ready, as self-governing subjects of the Crown, to assume the full status of partners in the responsibilities and obligations as well as in the privileges of Empire. The desire to acquire as soon as possible the fullest measure of Imperial citizenship is growing among many of the most thoughtful of the people of Canada, and I rejoice, as we must all rejoice, in the evidence of the strengthening self-respect of an adult, no longer an adolescent, nation. It is my happy conviction that the people of the United Kingdom will welcome the people of Canada and the people of the other self-governing Dominions as soon as they are ready with open arms to the counsels of the Empire, where the grave matters which affect us all alike are settled. The demand for a due share in those counsels, once made, will be responded to in no spirit of grudging exclusiveness or insular prejudice, but with the generous welcome of a people hailing a growth of their own strength in the young and growing vigour of their sons. The spirit of exclusiveness is happily buried in the limbo of past errors."

"The belief that exists throughout the whole of Canada," he continued, "that no obstacle will be offered by the peoples of the United Kingdom to the assumption by Canada of her fair share of the Imperial privilege, as soon as she is ready to claim the full responsibility of her Imperial growth, has already attached her loyalty to the Crown and to the British connection, with roots too deep ever to be removed, except by such folly as no one can for a moment imagine ever to be possible. But the problem of combining the unimpaired enjoyment of autonomous rights by each self-governing portion of the Empire in its own local affairs with the duty of sharing in the burdens and the privilege of taking part in the deliberation of matters common to the whole still remains to be solved. The solution of it is perhaps the highest of all the duties that lie before the present and rising generations of statesmen throughout the British world, and in my belief the task cannot be undertaken too soon."

THE British visit to Russia has been the subject of a good deal of unfavourable comment in the press. Greater publicity in the arrangements would have inspired stronger confidence that there will be no attempt to cultivate friendship by an unreal suppression of points of difference. It is noteworthy that the religious feeling of the country is to be represented officially by four bishops. There are no representatives from the ministry of the large Nonconformist bodies or the Church of Scotland.

PERHAPS one reason for this omission is to be found in the following words of Professor Bernard Pares, who appears to have been the organising genius of the party. After claiming that the visit was national and not merely parliamentary, he said: "A feature of the visit promises to be the discussion of the possibility of union between the Russian Orthodox Church and the Anglican Church. The chairman of the Society for the Union of the two Churches, though not a member of the British party, will be present in St. Petersburg during the visit, and will take part in ecclesiastical meetings and ceremonies." It is ludicrous, to say the least, that this ecclesiastical fad should be spoken of gravely as part of the important business of a national visit. National feeling is quite indifferent to it, but there can be little doubt that it would be actively hostile if a policy of this kind were at any time to become aggressive, for it would tend inevitably to sink the Church of England into an inert clerical formalism and to widen the breach with Nonconformity.

THE Home Secretary received an important deputation on Demoralising Literature on Tuesday. It was introduced by Mr. St. Loe Strachey. Among those present were several, like Mr. John Murray, connected directly with publishing or the press. Mr. Strachey, speaking for the deputation, laid stress upon the importance of a healthy public opinion to check the sale of improper and demoralising books, but he urged that some strengthening of the law was needed in order to meet the case of magistrates or judges who felt themselves bound by a technical definition of the word "obscene." He also asked that the Home Office and the police should be more vigilant and active in the matter of prosecutions; even an unsuccessful prosecution acted as a powerful deterrent. The police should be allowed to give evidence that a particular newspaper or periodical devoted itself to depraving public morals. In view of the objection that this might involve a police censorship, he suggested that the police should be willing to receive from societies or individuals complaints as to specific books and then to refer such books to a competent adviser.

MR. McKENNA made a most sympathetic reply. It showed, he said, what a really healthy public spirit there must be in the country when such a deputation came forward to press on the police and the Home Office the duty of interfering in their own trade. He expressed himself as favourable to a policy of taking more risks in endeavouring to secure more vigilant enforcement of the law, and held out hopes of a consolidating Bill ending Bill on the lines suggested by the deputation. At the same time he emphasised the difficulty of dealing with an evil of this kind by legislation. It was impossible to lay down a hard-and-fast line, and the success or failure of legislation must depend to a great extent upon public opinion.

MR. McKENNA spoke of the evil itself in the strongest possible terms, describing it as a loathsome disease. Many people, he said, were disposed to believe, because they never, or hardly ever, saw literature of this kind themselves, that the alleged presence of the evil in our midst was more or less of a mare's nest. The records of Scotland Yard showed that this was not so. The police knew from experience that a very large quantity of indecent literature circulated in the most improper manner possible in schools among young boys and girls. Of course, the authors, publishers, and distributors hoped that a readier market would be found for it among those who were least able to protect themselves. He was entirely a supporter of freedom of trade provided freedom of trade was for the public good. This was not trading for the public good, and no mere general support of freedom of trade in another connection would deter him from endeavouring to put an end to a trade of this kind.

* * *

OF the general objects of the deputation and the tenor of Mr. McKenna's answer, we believe there will be general and hearty approval. But it must not be forgotten that the subject is one that bristles with difficulties. The moral atmosphere of a newspaper may be more dangerous and corrupting than the cruder and more repulsive methods of a writer who exposes himself to prosecution by the police. The Sunday press, with a few exceptions, can hardly be described as healthy or clean. It lies under grave suspicion of publishing many things not in the public interest, but because they are suggestive and help to sell the paper; but interference by law would be very difficult in cases of this kind just because it would be almost impossible to prove a technical offence, and punishment must depend upon definite law-breaking.

THE suggestion that individuals or societies should be encouraged to make complaints to the police does not strike us as a very happy one. And for this reason.

It would probably result in some private society setting itself up as the guardian and censor of public morals in this matter. Its members, unless they were endowed with an unusual amount of moral breadth and sanity, would degenerate into a disagreeable and pharisaic type of person, suspicious of evil where it does not exist, and eager to prove their value to society by a persistent policy of prying. We are anxious to do everything in our power to encourage a strong and widespread public opinion, but we see a real danger of reaction against the policy of vigilance committees or small coteries of men and women who constitute themselves into specialists upon certain forms of moral evil.

A "clerical matinée" seems to be one of the latest forms of theatrical advertisement. Four thousand clergy attended an afternoon performance of "The Miracle" at Olympia last week. A correspondent in the Manchester Guardian has described the scene. "The published aim was to strike the note of worship. The cathedral was more quiet than most cathedrals. The men took off their hats, no one talked above a whisper, even the programme-sellers imitated the nun and the Spielmann and sold their wares in pantomime. There was some loose talk beforehand of imitating the spirit of Oberammergau, which would be about as easy as it would be to enact a mystery play in Piccadilly Circus. One quite missed the homely excitement of 'God Save the King' at the end. Some people saw a concession to the occasion in the behaviour of the knight, who instead of plucking up the nun in his arms and striding with her out into the darkness, merely strolled away by her side." After this touch of melodrama we are not surprised that the clergy present were invited to send in suggested improvements so as "to deepen the religious impression."

BUT, seriously, we are inclined to ask ourselves whether this sort of thing does a greater wrong to dramatic art or to religion. Mediæval pageantry woven round the conventional motives of mediæval religion does not make a play religious or give it any special suitability for clerical patronage. We do not insult the deep human significance of "Hamlet" or "King Lear" or a play by Sophocles by stage tricks and false appeals to sentiment of this kind. The man of the world will treat this elaborately contrived scene at Olympia with good-humoured laughter as the latest thing in advertisements, and probably the man of the world will be right.

THE chief literary event of the week has been the publication of the Life of Cardinal Newman by Mr. Wilfrid Ward. Mr. Ward has had access to private letters and papers which throw a great deal of fresh light upon the controversies of Newman's later years. But his practised literary skill has had to grapple with two difficulties. The most deeply interesting part of Newman's life has been told in the Apologia, and he has been too wise to try to gild its fine gold. Accordingly, the greater part of his two large volumes is devoted to the Roman Catholic period, and it is not his fault if Newman in controversy fails to exercise the spell of Newman in his confessions. In addition to this, in spite of the deep and abiding fascination of his subject for many minds, the appeal of Newman is not what it was. The world of the Oxford Movement and of Anglo-Catholic theology has contracted into something much smaller than it once appeared. On many of the abiding problems of the soul Newman will always speak with power, but for our special difficulties he has little illumination. For these reasons Mr. Wilfrid Ward cannot assume the deep and widespread interest which existed a few years ago, and it is doubtful whether even the unusual excellence of his biographical workmanship will be able to recreate it.

MR. C. G. MONTEFIORE has addressed a letter to the Westminster Gazette in order to correct some inaccuracies in a recent article on the Liberal Jewish Synagogue. We refer to it here because it reveals a growing tolerance and sympathy for the liberal movement within English Judaism. "It is happily not the case," he writes, "that the more orthodox of the community lose no opportunity of denouncing reform of any kind in Judaism. I am very glad to say that a very large number of 'more orthodox' Jews, though they may not agree with the principles and practices of the new Liberal Jewish Synagogue, are far too charitable and broad-minded, far too convinced of the inevitability of different views in matters of religion, to 'denounce' any kind of 'reform.'"

THE Council of the Churchmen's Union have passed the following resolution, of which a copy has been forwarded to the Prime Minister:—

"The Council of the Churchmen's Union, without expressing any opinion on the question of Welsh Disestablishment, wish to express their strong conviction that whatever legislation is adopted with reference to the Established Church in Wales, that Church should be left in a Constitutional and financial position which will permit of its carrying on its work freely and efficiently. They are also of the opinion that the provisions of the Bill of 1909 fail in this respect."

THE SECRET OF PERSONALITY.

AMONG the crowd of books which have appeared during the recent publishing season there are two which seem to stand apart in distinction and impressiveness. We refer to Mr. G. M. TREVELYAN'S "Garibaldi and the Making of Italy," and "The Life of Ruskin" by Mr. E. T. COOK. They are both written with fine literary art, and they both appeal to sentiments and loyalties which are among the deepest and most sacred we know, the impassioned love of country and the dedicated service of the common good. But we bring them together here for another reason. They have in them the rare quality of revelation. Each in its own way brings us face to face with the mystery of personality, and if it does not explain its secret makes us feel its power.

MR. TREVELYAN'S volume must be taken in connection with the two which have preceded it. It is the third movement of his trilogy in praise of Italy's great liberator. The praise, we must add, has in no way injured the candour of the historian. Every available source of evidence has been used to the full, and even the casual reader must be impressed by the vast labour of research which lies behind those glowing pages. But if Mr. TREVELYAN'S work is fine as history it is even finer as portraiture. GARIBALDI looms before us like some mythical figure of romance. He is the hero of a hundred hair-breadth escapes, and bears a charmed life through the hottest battles. At his command the spectres of cowardice and despair flee away. He lays the spell of his own courage on men, and suddenly they are strong as with the strength of ten. His enemies might easily have outwitted him in tactics, but they were powerless against the crusader of patriotism. As a political thinker he may have had little importance, but as a leader of men he was invincible. Nothing could illustrate this superb quality of personal magnetism better than the following account by the late Rev. H. R. HAWES of a young Milanese noble whom he met at the siege of Capua, which is quoted by Mr. TREVELYAN.

"He was poorly equipped and almost in rags; he had nothing but a sword and pistol. 'What induced you,' I said, 'to give up ease and luxury for this life of a dog, in a camp without commissariat, pay, or rations?' 'You may well ask,' he said. 'I tell you a fortnight ago I was in despair myself, and thought of giving up the whole thing. I was setting on a hillock, as might be here.' GARIBALDI came by. He stopped, I don't know why. I had never spoken to him. I am sure he did not know me, but he stopped. Perhaps I looked very dejected, and indeed I was. Well, he laid his hand on my shoulder and simply said, with that low, strange, smothered voice that seemed almost like a spirit speaking inside me, 'Courage, courage! We are going to fight for our country.' Do you think I could ever turn back after that? The next day we fought the battle of the Volturmo."

It was just the same at the battle of Milazzo. The words Coraggio, uomini, spoken in a quiet thrilling voice amid the rain of the enemy's bullets, turned his raw recruits into heroes. They did not ask, and we cannot tell, why it was. This personal power of life over life, the energy which communicates itself in quickening power, is part of the secret of personality in which all men share, though it may be so limited in its range that we hardly perceive it. But in a few elect souls like GARIBALDI it makes itself felt as an authentic revelation of the spiritual forces which rule the world.

When we pass from GARIBALDI to RUSKIN we are conscious of many startling contrasts and incompatibilities, and the reader may be excused if he wonders for a moment what possible connection except a common love of Italy there can be between the two; and yet, when Mr. COOK comes to the task of trying to sum up the meaning of RUSKIN and his message, he tells us in words that might be used with equal justice of GARIBALDI, that he had "the attraction of joy, of fervour, of life." Mrs. MEYNELL wrote of him in a similar strain not long ago: "One thing RUSKIN never lacks, never flags in, and that is an invincible vitality. Compared with his great vitality, the vivacity of other authors is little more than an insignificant or ineffectual agitation." Words like these are meant to express the elusive secret of personality which charms, and arrests and compels. They may be disappointing to those who are concerned chiefly with abstract theories of art or paper theories of reform; but they convey exactly the impression which these two volumes of biography leave with us as a joy for ever. Mr. COOK does not describe RUSKIN, he reveals him. Slowly the portrait emerges from the mass of detail like the "Pensée" of Rodin from the rough-hewn marble, and in the end we know RUSKIN as we never knew him before, and see deeper into the secret of his marvellous influence. He summoned all the powers of heart and mind to his aid, and poured the whole of his personality like living fire into every task. Seldom has there been such perfect fusion between the vital forces of personality and the work accomplished in the eyes of the world. RUSKIN never studied or spoke or wrought with half his mind, and it is hard to think of any book or drawing or social enterprise of his apart from its creator. The following vignette from a walking tour in Switzerland will perhaps take us as near to the heart of his secret as it is possible for us to go:—

"First I had a hot march among the vines, and between their dead stone walls; once or twice I flagged a little, and began to think it tiresome; then I put my mind into the scene, instead of suffering the body only to make report of it, and looked at it with the possession—taking grasp of the imagination—the true one; it gilded all the dead walls, and I felt a charm in every vine tendril that hung over them. It required an effort to maintain the feeling; it was poetry while it lasted, and I felt that it was only while under it that one could draw, or invent, or give glory to any part of such landscape. I repeated 'I am in Switzerland' over and over again, till the name brought back the true group of associations, and I felt I had a soul, like my boy's soul, once again. I have not insisted enough on this source of all great contemplative art. The whole scene without it was but sticks and stones, and steep dusty road."

There is unfortunately very little writing or teaching or service of human need, in which the soul has entered in this way into its kingdom. For most men "the sticks and stones and steep dusty road" remain, and create a sense of discord and futility at the heart of life. Even in our best moments we love God with half our mind, and then we try to justify the failure of the books that are written or the sermons that are preached or the services that are rendered in this mood by railing against the inattention or scepticism of the world. It would be wiser for us to remember that our first business is to make inattention impossible, not by the external and bizarre methods of self-advertisement, but by putting more of ourselves into our task.

There is nothing in human life which depends for its power so entirely upon these hidden forces of personality as religion, and by a strange irony there are few of the deeper interests of men which fall such an easy prey to the passion for abstract ideas. But it is through the obedience of the consecrated will and the illumination of sacrificial love that the soul comes to the knowledge of God. Religious advance does not consist in detachment from persons and allegiance to ideas. It is only on the lower levels that the philosopher can take the place of the saint or teaching about sacrifice usurp the authority of the Cross. It is for this reason that the noblest and most religious minds have always felt that a Christianity without personal devotion to JESUS CHRIST is impossible. When it is dissolved into an abstract system of spiritual principles and moral precepts it becomes in the process something weaker and lower than the personified and conquering Love, which prompted its greatest interpreter to say "The Word became flesh and we beheld his glory." It is as true to-day as it was when these words were written that the loyalties of discipleship are its unchanging language, and CHRIST in the heart is the secret of its power.

Religion often finds its best helpers in its unofficial allies. The two biographies we have named will do it a notable service if they rescue some minds from the mirage of abstractions and enrich them with clearer insight into the spiritual significance of personality.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

BERGSON ON LAUGHTER.

MY first impression on reading M. Bergson's treatise on Laughter* was that another contribution had been made to the "still, sad music of humanity." As some men are said to be cheered by reading the "Anatomy of Melancholy," so there are others on whom the analysis of laughter will have this sobering effect. M. Bergson utters a warning in that sense in the last sentence of his book. "The philosopher who gathers a handful [of the comic foam] may find that the substance is scanty and the after-taste bitter."

For the book reveals the extent to which we men are deceived by that very instrument on which we rely in order to protect ourselves from deception—the Intelligence. We are reminded of a saying of M. Bergson's great countryman, Condillac, that the most intelligent people are precisely those who deceive themselves most readily. Fortunately for them and for us, they do so at the cost of making themselves objects of laughter, thereby setting in motion a process which warns them of their error and brings them to their senses by a touch of the whip. The comic is an effect produced by pure intelligence seeking to represent a reality which requires more than intelligence to comprehend it. That reality is Life. Whenever Life is thus apprehended it is misapprehended, it becomes empty, abstract, unreal, and, as such, a subject for mirth. The prevalence of such misapprehension in regard to all the matters that concern us most is the tragedy as well as the comedy of our life. The very thing at which we laugh when seen in detail should make us weep when grasped in its totality. Hence M. Bergson's treatise on laughter may be said to have a tragic background and to produce a sobering effect.

The clown on the stage can make us laugh by pretending to strut like a wooden mannikin. But there is a subtler comedy which lies in the strutting of ideas, of habits, of formulæ, and all copybook maxims of life. The awkwardness, the stiffness, the unbending rigidity, the certainty of a humiliating fall at which we laugh in the strutting clown, are reproduced in finer, and often far more deeply comic forms in the strutting intelligence, the strutting character, the strutting personality—and, we must add, the strutting philosophy. It has been the mission of M. Bergson to deliver us from these strutting habits—to teach us, in fact, to walk on the stage of life and thought with the freedom of living men, and not like mechanically operated marionettes. And he fitly opens his mission by revealing to us the secret of laughter. Incidentally M. Bergson shows us the extent to which we make ourselves ridiculous; but the humiliation which this involves is a cheap price to pay for the lesson he has to teach.

Huxley's famous comparison of life to a game of chess may be used for throwing light on Bergson's philosophy of the Comic. If we imagine a chess-player obsessed by a fixed idea of a particular final arrangement of pieces on the board and trying to produce that arrangement without any reference to the counter moves of his opponent, it is easy to see that such a player would be defeated in every game. Each player is determined to win, and this determination represents what we call the "inflexibility" of his purpose. But if we ask what "winning" means for either of them, we see at once that it does not mean a foreknowledge from start to finish of the exact state of the board at the moment when victory is declared. For if it meant that for A who thinks he is going to win, what does it mean for B, who, on this hypothesis, is equally determined to win by producing another arrangement of the board? To provide the conditions of a genuine game, before all else it is necessary that neither of them should know in advance the exact state of the board which constitutes check-mate for one of them. The game continues only so long as the final state of the board is genuinely indeterminate. We may say, of course, that it is determinate in the sense that one of them is certain to win. But which? And how? If we could answer these questions the game would have no interest or meaning, either for us or them, and would, of course, never be played.

Thus it would appear that the more inflexible a man is in his determination to win, the more flexible he must be in regard to his ideas of the particular arrangement of pieces that will give him the victory. His ideas on this latter subject must be ready to adapt themselves at every moment to the changes of situation created by the moves of his opponent. A fixed idea of a particular arrangement will be his ruin. Rigidly tied down to a mental picture of King here, Queen there, Knight somewhere else, and going at it like a bull at a gate, he would be check-mated by a skilled opponent in four moves. This would be chess pour rire.

Such a chess-player, in bondage to a fixed idea, illustrates M. Bergson's conception of a comic personality. The difference between the man whom we laugh at and the man whom we take seriously is that the former is the victim of a mechanical habit as to his body or an equally mechanical formula as to his mind, while the latter has acquired the elasticity of motion which saves his body from being broken, and the elasticity of thought which follows and adapts itself to the ever fluid life of the world. In short, a person becomes comic or ridiculous just in so far as he divests himself of the proper attribute of personality, which is incessant adaptiveness, and becomes a mere thing, impelled, shoved, knocked and pushed about by the force of his mechanical habits or his mechanical ideas—his prepossessions, his prejudices, his bigotries, as they are more commonly called. Everywhere comedy arises from the same conditions—from mechanism seeking to do duty for life; whence it follows that the rigid system of thought, when it claims to be commensurate with life, like the rigid body or the rigid mind, is not without its comic character—we are impelled to smile at the awkwardness of it.

All this may be clearly seen in the coarser forms of comedy. M. Bergson cites the case of two clowns on the stage who put themselves in the attitude of wooden dummies and belabour one another with cudgels; the blows fall on their heads with the thud of enormous mallets and the two men fall prone like a pair of oaken beams. Roars of laughter greet the performance. In the same way was Don Quixote belaboured by his fixed ideas, the blows he received from the windmill or the sticks of the shepherds being but symbols of what was going on in his mind. In the same way will two contentious persons, each in bondage to a rigid system, belabour one another with arguments, "the blows of the mallets on the wooden skulls resounding through the silent house," until at the end of the performance the two disputants lie outstretched in the arena "like oaken beams." The living mind, as well as the living body, may stiffen itself into a mechanical dummy. When it does so, we laugh.

But why do we laugh? The late Charles Carroll Everett, Dean of the Harvard Divinity School—a man whose sense of humour might be compared with Dr. Martineau's—once said that his studies of the Philosophy of the Comic, in Kant, Herbert Spencer, and others, left upon his mind the impression that a joke was about the most serious thing in the world. Dr. Everett's impression would have been deepened had he lived to read M. Bergson's contribution to the Philosophy of the Comic. According to M. Bergson, we laugh for a serious reason—though, fortunately for our laughter, it is a reason we seldom make explicit to ourselves. Rigid mechanism, whether of mind or body, is dangerous—dangerous to the mechanical person in the first instance, dangerous to the society of which he is a member in the second. In this world of flowing life, whatever stiffens itself is doomed, sooner or later, to be broken. And Nature, ever on her guard against mechanism as the thing most fatal to her designs, has devised an instrument which serves the double purpose of a signal to warn the victims of mechanism, and of a lash to punish them for their mistake. That instrument is laughter—a beneficent invention! Habits which resist modification under change of environment, ideas which refuse to grow with the general growth of life, prejudices which close our eyes to new light, moral canons which have crystallised into the scribe's rule of thumb, characters which are wedded to abstract formulæ—these are the harmful things against which Nature warns us by making them ridiculous. She weans the fool from his folly, and cures the bigot of his narrow-mindedness—by a laugh. And certainly we must admit that if we were deprived of laughter, and allowed to deal with our own and other people's follies only by way of argument, the prospects of wisdom in this world would be extremely unpromising.

Thus it will be seen that M. Bergson's "Laughter" is no mere excursus into an isolated region apart from the general scope of philosophy. It is a serious contribution to the comprehension of life, and may even be regarded as fundamental to M. Bergson's teaching; in any case, an admirable introduction to his work as a whole. In the final chapter it expands into a philosophy of art, a thing hard to distinguish from a philosophy of life. After reading the book as a whole no doubt will be left in a candid mind that any philosophy which regards the comic as beneath or outside the circle of its concerns is making a most serious mistake. Some will even think, and not without reason, that a consideration of the comic is essential to any sane view of life. The reader may be left to himself to judge whether or no M. Bergson's philosophy gains or loses in value by making provision for laughter within the ambit of its principles. Certain it is that some philosophers make no such provision—as others make none for Beauty—and they do not seem to the present writer to gain by the omission. For laughter, and all that it implies, covers a pretty wide range of human life, and they surely reckon ill who leave it out. M. Bergson's treatise, indeed, throws light in many things besides laughter—on the theory of knowledge, on ethics, and, perhaps, on religion; and any reader who turns to this book merely in the hope that it will amuse him is not unlikely to find himself at the end in the position of Saul of Israel, who went out to seek his father's asses and found a kingdom. No doubt moral stalwarts will find something in this book, as they do in all M. Bergson's works, to arouse their suspicions. They will not like his constant insistence on "flexibility." That, they will say, is French, not English. But unless moral stalwartness means moral woodenness—and, of course, it should mean nothing of the kind—these suspicions are wholly without cause. The only type of moral stalwart M. Bergson really offends is the type we usually class—though perhaps mistakenly—under the "Scribes and Pharisees," and such an offence is no betrayal of morality. It is not the inflexibility which is the mark of all great minds that M. Bergson attacks; it is the inflexibility of little minds, or rather of all minds when they contract into machines. It is not the inflexibility of the chess-player who is determined to win, but the inflexibility of the chess-player who has doomed himself to lose.

M. Bergson has been fortunate in his English translators. Mr. Cloudesley Brereton and Mr. Fred Rothwell may be congratulated on having preserved in the English version the charm as well as the wisdom of M. Bergson's work.

I.

To anyone who has sufficiently emancipated himself from the tyranny of the past to study the present with genuine interest and enthusiasm, New York presents itself as a city of almost incredible fascination. It is, to begin with, quite beautiful in its own strange and extravagant way—not as a result of any collective civic intention, perhaps, but by reason of the haphazard grouping of buildings of all heights and shapes and sizes in the comparatively limited space between two broad rivers—buildings which form wonderful sky-lines such as you will not see in any other city in the world. Then, too, there is all the cosmopolitan variety and colour of its street-life, the spaciousness of its avenues and the splendour of its houses, the vistas of Central Park, and that broad sweep of the Hudson seen from Riverside Drive, the beauty of the harbour, and the green slopes of Staten Island which are such a welcome sight to the homecoming American as he surveys them from the deck of an ocean liner; above all, the delicious exhilaration communicated by a clear dry atmosphere which contributes much to the cheerfulness and gaiety of its inhabitants.

There is, inevitably, a good deal that must jar on sensitive nerves. It is impossible to make a single journey on the elevated railway from Broadway to Battery Park without realising that here, too, are all those contrasts between poverty and wealth, those signs of economic pressure and crass materialism which are not absent from any of the great centres of commerce. But in spite of its East side and its tenement houses, in spite even of its flaring advertisements, New York weaves a spell of enchantment which the visitor from the old world tries in vain to resist. After vigorously asserting that nothing on earth could ever induce you to say a good word for a sky-scraper, you find yourself turning, again and again, as you cross Madison Square, to look up at the slender campanile of the Metropolitan Building soaring up to the blue sky in all the pride of its alleged 50 stories, or to stare in fearful amazement at the Flat Iron, thrusting itself, like the hull of some monstrous Atlantic liner, into the traffic of one of the busiest thoroughfares in the city. The Americans are immensely proud of their tall buildings, and tell you smilingly that "there is nothing like them in all Europe."

The obvious answer, and one which enables you to avoid making invidious comparisons is that there is nothing like them in the whole world. But, indeed, even a sky-scraper may become a noble and dignified erection, when it is designed with due regard not only to the accommodation it is to provide and to the light it must not shut out, but to the æsthetic effect it is to produce on the man in the street; and the new style of architecture which has been evolved to meet the needs of a city so cramped for space that it must grow upwards, because its expansion has been stopped in every other direction, deserves more than a word of praise. The artists, at all events, have begun to see some beauty in those towers and ramparts of stone or marble, encasing solid steel, which are continually being raised from the rocky foundations of Manhattan to gleam in the sunlight by day, and flash their myriad globes of fire across the river after dark. For some of them, as a writer in Harper's recently reminded us, the inspiration of New York is inexhaustible, and they seem to rejoice that commerce and the inventive spirit of a new country, rich in possibilities undreamed of on this side of the Atlantic, have resulted in the rearing of buildings as sumptuous with marble as Genoese palaces, and crowned with cupolas and minarets at dizzy heights which strike you with something like terror when you see them for the first time.

The sinister thing about New York is not, after all, its sky-scrapers, monstrous and fantastic as they frequently are; for these speak of the achievements of men, of the civilisation that advances, although it is devoutly to be hoped that a time will never come when, in the words of an enthusiastic American, even the Flat Iron may seem a hut "from other and higher floors." The fact which troubles a thinking man or woman most about New York is its passionate devotion to wealth and pleasure, and if the traveller really believed what he is told in England, that America is solely dominated by the power of the "almighty dollar," and the craving to have "a good time," he would scarcely think it necessary to journey beyond Fifth Avenue in order to gather information as to the aims and pursuits of this astonishing nation. But although Americans give the greater part of their time and attention to money-making, and are constantly talking about the present and future prosperity of their country, the plutocrats are by no means typical of the people as a whole. They belong to that denationalised class to be found alike in London and Paris, in Monte Carlo and Cairo, on the Champs Elysées or in Park Lane; a class characterised by the same luxurious habits, shibboleths, love of gambling, fashionable apparel, and ambitions (if you can call them ambitions) wherever two or three are gathered together. In the United States, as elsewhere, they set a false standard of living which the envious millions vainly strive to emulate, and in the consequent irritation engendered by the feverish attempt to acquire enough money to squander on meaningless pleasures, the higher aims, the true spirit of patriotism, and the sense of personal responsibility which can alone save a nation from decay are forgotten.

Chicago, although it has an unenviable reputation for rampant materialism which New York cannot surpass, impresses the traveller more quickly with its civic pride and social activities. The evils which it has yet to abolish have been mitigated to a remarkable extent by public-spirited men and women who are responsible for its university buildings, charitable institutions, settlements, and "Park system"; and, in spite of its ugliness as one surveys it from the roof of the 24-story Masonic Building, this city, too, is seen to be not devoid of beauty as you drive through its broad boulevards (there are 35 miles of them!) along the sunny Midway Plaisance, down that magnificent avenue which is bordered on one side by the blue waters of Lake Michigan, and out through leafy suburbs with charming names which indicate the character of the stretches of woodland they are gradually attaching to the city. Surely there are no finer parks anywhere! And surely in no other country is so much done to make of these great open spaces really popular resorts for the people where wholesome exercise, food, and instruction may be obtained at a nominal cost. Here are to be found refectories, free libraries, natural history museums, tennis courts, swimming pools, reading-rooms, gymnasias, and playing grounds in abundance. Everywhere there are signs of the coming of a new era in which the labouring classes shall, at least, have every opportunity out of working hours to develop sound minds in sound bodies. But all this must be linked, as we have reason to believe it is, to a very large extent, to equally strenuous efforts to raise the ethical standard, so that the next generation may bring something more than fevered imagination and undisciplined thoughts to bear upon the grave problems which are already exercising the minds of religious thinkers, sociologists, and employers of labour. It is of these problems that one is constantly being reminded in America, for the old order is changing rapidly, and the New World has now become involved in that terrible tangle of economic difficulties with which the older countries of Europe are attempting to deal.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING.

SIR,—Certain comments on the proposals of the Simplified Spelling Society appeared in your issue of the 6th inst.

I ask the privilege of making a somewhat belated reply. The brief and hurried exposition is inaccurate and unjust. "Nothing seems to be gained even from the point of view of the child, in whose interests it would certainly be desirable to make spelling easier"—so runs the verdict. Illustrations follow: "In the word 'simplified,' for instance, the letter 'e' is still retained for no particular reason that we can see, while it is added to the first syllable of 'society' (soeciety) for no obvious purpose." Every jot and tittle of this criticism bears witness to a cursory glance, and that alone, as though the inquirer were impatient and would not stay for deeper looking.

Take the last syllable of the word 'simplified,' the vowel sound is long. In the middle syllable it is short. How are we to distinguish? The long 'i' sound shall be written down as 'ie,' for the sake of distinction, say the reformers. Surely the reason is sufficient. Similarly, the 'oe' in 'soeciety'—the word is incorrectly copied in your note, which, if the printer be not to blame, is another instance of careless judgment—is to distinguish the long vowel from the short, 'noet' from 'not.' Is not the purpose obvious, after all? This is the place to remark upon the difficulties of representing forty sounds or so with twenty-two letters, k, q, x being redundant. It is true that some words may have to be enlarged under the new régime. I can quite understand the disappointment of the man who regards a shrunken shape as the only sure sign of simplification. But his idea is mistaken. The essence of the matter is to give one symbol one unvarying value; and the authors of the new scheme have tried to do this within the narrow limits of the present alphabet. Is it not calculated to help the child, puzzled to death by the curiously changing wardrobe of English speech, by 'nay' and 'neigh,' 'wait' and 'weight,' 'move' and 'love,' 'great' and 'grate' and 'grail,' and a hundred others? A precious year of educational life is wasted in seeking to capture this Proteus of a boundless sea. I say a year on the best authority; Professor Max Müller puts it at three years. Think of the total national loss. And think, too, of the injury wrought upon the young fragile mind by a training in the unreason of the current spelling. No one would take up the cause of spelling reform and knock importunately at the brazen doors of prejudice and indifference, did he not feel, and feel strongly, that his efforts are for the morrow, for generations yet unborn. Must we hand down a millstone as our legacy?

Take the examples you snatched at random from the booklet issued by the Simplified Spelling Society, and quoted in your criticism: "We cannot help sharing the prejudice which exists in the minds of those who think that 'haist' looks uglier than 'haste,' and 'mien' and 'dien' more foreign and eccentric than 'mine' and 'dine.'" Then, Sir, having chosen 'haste' as your standard, you must go forth to beautify 'waist' and 'pail' and 'tail,' and—need I quote more? They are numerous as pebbles. And, perhaps, one may say here, in a kind of parenthesis, that in Anglo-Saxon and Early Modern English the words 'weigh' (woeg) and 'way' (waeg) were identical. Which is the more foreign and eccentric? Which the more ugly?

Your alchemy is complete, we shall say, and "waist," and "pail," and "tail," and all their kindred, stand before us with their dross purged away; lovely and lustrous are they as "waste," and "pale," and "tale." Sir, you have been simplifying; you have been seeking to reduce the number of variations. And you need not fear the philologists. The most eminent of them, Sir James Murray, Professor Skeat, and others, all with one accord cry out for spelling reform. Actually, they are members of the Simplified Spelling Society. I need not speak of "mien" and "dien" as against "mine" and "dine," save to ask why, if the "ie" be unlovely, you endure words like "die" and "pie," "cries" and "tries"—and their brethren whose name is legion. How "foreign and eccentric" they look! Are they English words? I sadly answer, yes.

You, Sir (I am assuming that the comments were editorial), have not thought out your position. You wrote in journalistic haste: I dare not write "haist." For the truth is, there is neither beauty nor ugliness in a mere marriage of letters; familiarity may blind us into the belief. It is a false guide. We take up a book written in a language we have never studied, a language we now see for the first time in printed word before us. "How ugly!" we are tempted to explode, even as you exclaimed on January 6.

Consider a moment. Is it not the uncouthness (which strictly means the unfamiliarity) that distresses us? Seen for the hundredth time, the strange script has won, it may be, a welcome from the eye.

I recall the cobblestone pavement in a Northern town. "Ugly" I should have called it at the bidding of a first impulse, but not so now. "Subtle laws of memory and association"—to borrow your words—have transfigured the old rough stones, and somehow I regard them as a golden pavement, for it is the path home. So with words as they are written. Their beauty is imputed, not inherent. For, if we ask a friend to write down twelve of the most "beautiful" words, he will give us a list of words which are beautiful to him. They may not be our shrines; but in his mind they are consecrated forever as the windows of remembrance and of vision. So far are the authors of the new scheme from doing violence to this feeling of reverence for the old forms of written expression, that they have followed the line of least disturbance; have, indeed, preserved the present alphabet—though phoneticians condemn it—and have sought, simply and sincerely, to lighten the labour of learning to spell by bringing together, so far as may be, sound and symbol. The children cry out for reform; so, too, our foreign subjects, and with them the foreigner who seeks entrance into this noble language and literature of ours. For some of your readers the subject may have more than a passing interest. They can secure further information from the offices of the Simplified Spelling Society, 44, Great Russell-street, W.C. My closing word must be one of thanks for your courtesy in printing this reply.—Yours, &c.,

THE NEW SOCIOLOGY.

Historical Sociology, a Textbook of Politics. Professor Frank Granger. Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.

A SENSE of exhilaration and expansiveness seems to be the characteristic of scientific writers at the present moment. There is everywhere the note of a new hopefulness. Old limitations to our knowledge are visibly breaking down, hard and fast distinctions between Spiritual Man and Material Nature are seen to be illusory. Writings like those of Prof. J. Arthur Thomson give an entirely new notion of what the world may come to understand by "Science." And part of this change is due to the abandonment of doctrinaire approaches to the old questions, for there is no dogmatist so hopeless as that kind of physical scientist who refuses to let the underlying assumptions of his physics be criticised, and regards his first principles as the purest data of Right Reason.

Sociology, in particular, stands to gain in the greatest degree by this new determination to re-open and face all questions afresh. The doctrinaire paths have been traversed by it so thoroughly and so often, that a more concrete and historical method was sure to be taken, even if only for a diversion. Evolutionism had been represented by Herbert Spencer in its earlier form, and in its later form by Prof. Giddings. Hegelian lines had been followed by Prof. Mackenzie and Prof. Bosanquet, and all these efforts were extremely interesting and helpful as preliminary experiments. In the meantime, however, a vast accumulation of new knowledge of folklore, anthropology, savage life and customs and religion, as well as of modern social experience, inevitably pressed upon the student the importance of employing induction as well as deduction, and treating his subject as matter for scientific classification and investigation rather than for the evolution of philosophical conceptions. Just as the abstractions of the classical economists had to give way to the observations of the historical school, Sociology, too, finds that its really fruitful line is in the detailed examination of what actually takes place among men as they live in social relations with each other, are grouped into various societies, and progress or degenerate according to the way in which they interpret the life they are called to live upon the earth. For, as Prof. Granger remarks, abstract notions have chiefly a negative value. This has been made abundantly plain of late in Economics, where the work done, however engrossing as a delightful intellectual pastime, is upon the whole a demonstration of the unsoundness of most previous doctrines on the subject. And Sociology is disposed to echo Huxley's "Feed me on facts."

This is why Prof. Granger's "textbook of politics" is so delightful, if at times so abruptly unsatisfying. We want his paragraphs to go on a line or two more. He suddenly develops from the most harmless truism to an astonishing dictum that tumbles down a half-trusted philosophy about our ears. One touch is sufficient—but we are left "unclothed upon," and would like to have him near to answer our questions. The questions that he asks us (placed at the end of the book) are of a kind we should like to hear put to candidates for Parliament before polling-day as a condition of their being allowed to stand, e.g., "Examine the statement that only the degenerate classes in England are destitute"; "How far do the inhabitants of the British Isles sustain life by hunting"; "How would you proceed to collect the most important social numbers for the locality in which you live?" All of which will give readers

(and not only beginners) furiously to think. Prof. Granger uses with fine effect that instrument of precision, the epigram: "I have read a good many books which offered to explain social things in general. But in all of them there is a surprising gap between the beginning of things and the Coronation of George the Fifth." How much modern history is packed into the following:—"Ruskin's dreams, with their subtle appeal to English prejudice (he vilified the renaissance, and his readers thought he was denouncing the Pope), completed what the industrial revolution began. For it was Ruskin who taught the architects of the Gothic revival to sweep out of our churches the delightful renaissance woodwork which, with all its limitations, brought down to the present a living tradition of design and craftsmanship." We are taught by this method to be on the look-out for all sorts of fact, and call none of them common or unclear for the purpose of sociological study. The danger of it is, of course, that we may get snippets instead of a well-ordered system and a significant body of ideas. As Prof. Granger's book stands, some will think that it presents a little bit of everything, something about anthropology, something about the history of religious development, something about the "physiological" (? physical) degeneracy of modern Europeans; and the reader must decide for himself whether he would rather have had more broad generalisations. Thus, e.g., we miss the great doctrine of the General Will as it was taught by Rousseau, and as Mr. Bosanquet has explained it to us to-day. (By the way, the reference on p. 195 should be to Chap. VII. not VI.) It seems plausible, no doubt, to say that the popular will, so far as we can speak of it at all, "consists in universally shared feelings which seek expression in a definite form of corporate action." It is easy then to show that the popular will is often wayward and deserves to have no sort of authority; and then the whole theory of democracy is in the melting-pot. Is there any sort of meaning, then, or continuous purpose, in social evolution? Concrete facts are very well, and the more the better, but unless they are interpreted they are a heap rather than a science. The ways of bushmen and the fashions of totems are extremely interesting, but their relevance and illustrative power are not always conspicuous when we are trying to understand the modern state, and such things as socialism. The ambitious explanations of Marx, no doubt, have gone down the wind along with the economics of Ricardo; but Prof. Granger's special method of overthrowing Marx is not convincing. He says (more than once in this book) that the Marxian interpretation of the English Industrial Revolution went astray because it took the Revolution as a type of economic evolution and neglected the special circumstances of the period. "Had it not been for the violent reaction of the English people against the French Revolution (and absorption in the conflict with Napoleon) it is possible that remedial legislation would have anticipated Lord Shaftesbury and the Factory Acts by a generation or more." Now, this is a particularly unfortunate example of the reconstruction of history on the method of the might-have-been. If the country had been less war-like and Tory it would have been more Whig and Liberal. It was the Whig and Liberal manufacturers who were against Factory Acts. It was the superb doctrinaire Macaulay who so heavily belaboured poor Southey for his suggestions towards social reform. John Bright's little finger would have been thicker against social reform in this sense than the body of the elder Sir Robert Peel, who passed an early Factory Act.

But, upon the whole, there is no doubt that Prof. Granger is in harmony with the best tendencies of our time when he leans away from ambitious formulations that attempt to express whole periods in nut-shell generalities. Concrete fact and growing life are the reality. This remark is worth pondering:—"What is apparently the decay of an old state of things is in reality the beginning of a fresh era in which the past is born again; an era in which intellectual forms are replaced by living intuitions." We take leave to italicise the last clause.

LITERARY NOTES.

A SELECTION of Meredith Letters, edited by Lord Morley, is expected to appear in the autumn, Messrs. Constable, in England, and Scribners, in America, being the publishers. The book will not be in any sense of the word a biography, and the letters will be simply arranged with such notes as are necessary.

* * *

MR. CLEMENT SHORTER is about to write a "Life of George Borrow," which will be the fifth attempt to write the life of the author of "Lavengro" since his death. Two other biographies of George Borrow are announced, but Mr. Shorter is able to give the public the privilege of reading many of Borrow's letters which have not been previously published, as he possesses a great mass of manuscript and private correspondence which he has had the good fortune to acquire from the lady who was sole executor of George Borrow's daughter, Mrs. MacOubrey.

* * *

MRS. HAVELOCK ELLIS is preparing a "Life of James Hinton," in which she aims at presenting the man as his friends rather than as the world knew him. Mrs. Ellis has had the assistance of many intimate friends in the work, together with access to private papers which will enable her to treat the subject with greater fulness than was possible to those who have preceded her. The book will be published by Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

* * *

WE learn from the Book Monthly that the London County Council is re-christening certain old streets with literary names, which have not hitherto figured very largely in this connection. Waterloo-street, in Hammersmith, is to be renamed Marryat-street, in memory of Captain Marryat's association with that district, while George-yard, off St. George-street, is to be rechristened Drood-street, because it was associated with the plot of "The Mystery of Edwin Drood."

A NEW biography of Isaac Watts, by Mr. Thomas Wright, of Olney, is almost completed. Isaac Watts should have a sure place in English literary history, not only as a famous hymn-writer, but on account of his treatises on "Logic" and "The Improvement of the Mind," which were for a long time in constant use as handbooks. Johnson and Southey both wrote "Lives" of Watts, and they were followed in 1875 by Mr. E. Paxton Hood.

* * *

DOSTOIEFFSKY is the subject of a new work by Mr. J. A. T. Lloyd, the author of "Two Russian Reformers." Dostoevsky's novels are based largely upon the record of his own experiences first as a political prisoner in Siberia, and afterwards as a lieutenant in the Army, and the story of his life should provide material for a very interesting book. Mr. Stanley Paul is the publisher.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE's speech on "The Relation of the Churches to Social Questions" at Cardiff, on December 29, has been reprinted as a penny pamphlet by the Christian Commonwealth, Salisbury-square, E.C.

The Book Monthly has made the interesting discovery that Japan, if rumour be true, publishes something like 20,000 volumes every year. Germany is said to come next, though the figures are not given; France publishes about 13,000, America from 8,000 to 9,000, while our output is between 9,000 and 10,000. Japan, therefore, is quite eclipsing other civilised nations, and has the glory of being the largest book producer; though it must be remembered that many Japanese books, like a good many German books, are only pamphlets, after all.

THE University of London Press will publish immediately "London Theological Essays," edited by the Rev. Professor A. Caldecott, D.D. Since the reorganisation of the University in London, in 1900, the teachers at the six Theological Colleges in London have been organised by the University into a Faculty. They have been closely associated in this way, and ten of their number offer in this volume some results of their study and reflection in their several branches of theology.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

ALFRED THE GREAT (871-901).

"The son of man whom Thou madest so strong for Thine own self."—Ps. lxxx. 17.

THIS time we are going to talk about a great man who was a king also. Alfred the Great lived about two hundred years later than Cædmon. You remember how unsettled England was in Cædmon's time, what wars and fights there were, and then, too, how few people knew anything about books. Well, when Alfred was made king, things were not much better. There was even more fighting than before, because the Danes were always coming over in their ships and landing on the coast of England, where they did great harm, burning people's houses, and robbing and murdering. They had been doing this for nearly a hundred years, and those that settled in England lived in war with their neighbours, and were always trying to get more and more land. And if you think a little, you will see what must have followed from all these wars. The monasteries, where, as I told you, the monks lived quietly, writing books and helping the poor people round them, were many of them burnt and robbed by the Danes, who were heathens, and had no respect for the monks in the same way that Christians had. And so what little learning there was in England was like to be snuffed out like a candle by these savage Northmen, whom the Anglo-Saxons were becoming afraid of. They wanted a leader to cheer them on, and that leader was Alfred. During his reign, which lasted only 30 years, he fought 56 battles by sea and land against the Danes, and in the end he left the country more settled than before, though the kings who came after him had still to do a great deal of fighting before the Danes settled down quietly. So, you see, Alfred had no easy time of it, and we are told that he was very unwilling to be made king, as he was very fond of learning, and would much rather have spent his time reading and writing Anglo-Saxon, which he had taught himself from hearing poems recited (as you remember, from the story of Cædmon, the Saxons used to be fond of doing), and translating books from Latin into Anglo-Saxon.

But when he was made king he gave all his mind to his kingdom, and the first years of his reign were spent mostly in fighting the Danes. In one single year he fought eight battles against them, but just when he thought they had agreed to settle peaceably in England and do no more harm, some others landed from Denmark, and took Chippenham. The Anglo-Saxons quite lost their pluck at this; some left the country and went to live in Wales, and some went over the sea for safety. Alfred himself was obliged to give up his Court and disguise himself like a poor man. He lived for some time in the house of a cowherd, and there it was that he was set to watch the cakes, and scolded by the cowherd's wife because he let them burn. He was thinking of other things, you see, most likely of how he could collect his scattered people round him again, and make England, which he loved so much, a place of peace and learning once more. But, all the same, he deserved the scolding, and I daresay he thought so, for though he was so much more learned and great than the poor cowherd's wife, that ought only to have made him more careful to do his best in small things. After a time, when the Danes had given up looking for him, he collected a few of his people round him and built a fortress on the Isle of Athelney, in Somersetshire. From here he used to march out suddenly upon the Danes, and got the better of them in several battles, and they never could find out where he lived, because the way to Athelney was through so many forests and bogs.

All these were small battles, and Alfred decided to fight a larger one which should make the Danes acknowledge him as king; but before doing so, he thought of a plan which would help him to see how strong the Danes were, and whether there was good order among them. He dressed himself as a harper and boldly went into the Danish camp, where he amused them by singing ballads, so that the Danish king himself invited Alfred into his tent, and he lived there several days. Alfred saw that his enemies were weak in many ways, which came from their feeling sure that they had beaten the English. They felt sure too soon, as we shall see, for Alfred, after these few days in the Danish camp, sent round messengers to all his bravest subjects and invited them to meet him on the borders of Selwood Forest. His people came and met him with much joy, for they had been afraid that he was dead. He led them to a place called Eddington, where the Danes had a camp, and there he fought a great battle, and the Danes acknowledged him their king. He was very good to them, and instead of killing those who were left alive, as used to be the custom in wars, he allowed them to settle in East Anglia and Northumbria on condition that they should look on themselves as English people, and become Christians. They agreed to this, and the great piece of country where they settled was called the Danelagh; many of them also settled in the five towns of Derby, Leicester, Stamford, Lincoln and Nottingham. You see how wise it was of Alfred to get the Danes to settle in this way, because when once they looked on themselves as English subjects, they could help in driving back the other Danes who tried to land on the East coast. After this battle of Eddington there was peace in England for a while, and Alfred was very busy in settling the country, giving the same laws to the Danes as to the English (so that they might be contented), building up towns again, which had been destroyed by the enemy, building fortresses all over the country, and building more ships to drive back the Danes before they could try to land.

Alfred was the first English king who saw that England ought to have a fleet to protect her from enemies, and for several years he succeeded in keeping the Danes out by his fleet of 120 ships. They came back again in 893, however, and Alfred again had a great deal of fighting before he could get the country into order. One of the commanders of the Danes had built larger ships than Alfred's, but Alfred soon found this out, and built bigger ones still, so that he won the battle. He took 20 of their ships, and then he saw that the only thing to do was to hang all the prisoners as pirates—that is to say, sea-robbers. After this England settled down into quietness again. Now Alfred had about four years of peace before he died (901), and he made the most of them and worked very hard for the good of his people. Perhaps you think a king must have an easy time of it, and have nothing to do but to amuse himself and let people wait on him. But a good king has to work as hard or harder than any of his subjects, and Alfred knew this, as we can tell by some of his writings which have been kept. "Hardship and sorrow," he says in one of these books, "not a king but would wish to be without these if he could. But I know that he cannot." For him, as well as fighting battles against his enemies, there was always a battle against himself to fight, and this is the hardest battle of all. You know that often each one of us seems to be two people; there is a naughty self in us and a good self, and the naughty self is always trying to persuade the good self that we needn't do the things we know we ought to do. Well, with Alfred it was very hard for the good self to work so busily, because he was always more or less poorly, all through his life, and you know that when one is poorly one just wants to be lazy and do nothing at all. So that Alfred was a really great man as well as a great king in getting the better of this lazy self, and doing more by the time he was 50, when he died, than most men do by the time they are 70.

I will tell you a few of the things Alfred did for the good of England. First of all, he translated good and wise books from Latin into Anglo-Saxon, so that those of his people who had only time to learn their own language might be able to read them. Then, so that better order might be kept, he divided England into counties, and the counties into hundreds, and the hundreds into tithings. Ten families made a tithing, and every tithing had one of the older men to look after it, and see that no one belonging to it did harm to their neighbors by fighting or stealing. This older man would call together all the people in his tithing to help him to decide what should be done to anyone who broke the laws, and so everybody felt that everyone had a hand in keeping order. If it was a very bad thing that had happened, the hundred—that is to say, ten tithings or a hundred families—would be called together to decide it, and out of these hundred families, twelve men would be chosen to help the judge or hundareder, as he was called) what to settle. When you hear of trials nowadays, you hear of a jury of twelve men who help the judge to decide. Well, you see, it was Alfred who first thought of that plan, and it has been found such a good one that it has lasted ever since. These meetings of the hundred were held every month, and besides these, the county court met once a year, and in this the bishop and alderman were the judges, and here any quarrel between two of the hundreds used to be decided. You see what a clear head Alfred must have had to think all this out so plainly, and his wise plans brought so much order into the country that we are told that he used to hang up golden bracelets near the high-roads, just to see if anyone would touch them, and no one did. Then, as order is chiefly useful in a country because it allows people to live in peace and to improve their ways of life by reading and knowing about things, Alfred set himself to make the people less ignorant by building schools where they could both be taught themselves and send their children; he asked the cleverest people from all parts of Europe to come over and help in the teaching; he built up the monasteries again (you remember they had been burnt and pulled down by the Danes), and he chose only those people who were clever scholars as well as good men to help him in governing. And all the time, while he thought it right to oblige people to send their children to school, just as you are sent now, he was himself working hard at his books.

Perhaps you wonder sometimes whether the people who make the laws now, and decide that you shall go to school every morning, bother themselves about geography and arithmetic and grammar. Well, you may be sure they are all busy in some way, though it may not be over books, but if you had lived in the time of Alfred, and had been able to look in on him in his palace, you would certainly have found him working hard at his books during eight hours of the day. For this was how he used to divide his time. There were no clocks at that time, so Alfred used to fix candles of an equal length inside lanterns. Each of these candles would burn eight hours, so that the 24 hours were divided into three parts of eight hours each. One of these parts he used to spend in sleeping, eating, and exercising; another he spent in attending to all the work of his kingdom, and the third he spent in reading and writing and praying. And in this way he got through more work than you would have thought possible when you remember that he was generally ill. Among the books that he wrote were many stories and parables in Anglo-Saxon, and he translated the Fables of Æsop—about the first book that English children could understand as well as grown-up people. Then he set trade going again; he invited industrious people from abroad to come and settle in England and teach us their trades, and he gave a seventh part of his own money to pay a number of workmen for rebuilding the towns and castles and palaces and monasteries which had been pulled down by the Danes. And all these things he did in twenty-nine and a half years—not quite thirty.

Why do you suppose he did them? He might much more easily have gone and hidden himself from the Danes, and then have crossed the sea to some foreign country where he could have lived peacefully reading his books and writing his stories. But that would have been selfish and lazy. Alfred said to his lazy self, "God has called me to be king, and I am going to do the best I can all my life for the English people, and it's no use your trying to make me a coward," and so the lazy self was beaten, like the Danes. And the only way for all of us to beat the lazy self is to love something else very much, better even than we love ourselves. If Alfred had not loved God and the English people better than himself, he could not have been the great king and great man that he was. That is why I want you to remember him by the verse which I have written out for you: "The son of man whom Thou madest so strong for Thine own self." Because Alfred loved God and tried with all his might and main to make England into a place where people could grow to love God and keep His commandments better, God made him strong enough to do all the work I have told you of, and to leave England in a better state when he died than it had ever been in before.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. WILLIAM LEWIS.

THE late Mr. William Lewis, of Nottingham, must not pass from our midst with the bare intimation of his death. A member of a family which has been connected with the High Pavement Chapel for several generations and considerably upwards of a century, he was, until ill-health laid him aside, a leader among North Midland Unitarians, and a greater help than he perhaps ever knew by reason of his enthusiasm and never failing cordiality. Though an invalid for a very long time, and confined to the house for the last two years, his interest in the High Pavement Chapel and the work of the district never flagged, and the cheeriness and optimism with which he rose superior to his ailments were alike a lesson and an encouragement to those who had the privilege of his friendship. Every struggling congregation had his sympathy, and while his health permitted he was always ready to give his active assistance. He was one of the wardens of High Pavement Chapel when the new building was first proposed, and during its erection devoted much time and energy to the successful carrying out of the work. He was a trustee of the High Pavement and of Christ Church, and also of the chapels at Ilkeston, Newark, and Belper. Perhaps, however, it was to the work of the Sunday school that he gave the deepest devotion. He was for many years an enthusiastic and much beloved teacher in the High Pavement school, and it is only recently that he retired from its presidency. He was proud to be able to say that for nearly one hundred years there had never been a period in its history when a member of his family was not connected with it.

SHEFFIELD ASSOCIATION OF LIBERAL CHURCHES.

AN important step in the religious life of Sheffield and district has been taken by the formation of an Association to link up the Unitarian Free Christian and Free Congregational churches in the district. The Association was inaugurated on Thursday, January 18, at a meeting at the Channing Hall, Sheffield. The churches in question have previously been connected with the Yorkshire Association, centred at Leeds, but for some time it has been felt that this plan is not satisfactory, and that Sheffield and district should form an Association of its own.

The objects of the new Association are:—(1) The encouragement and support of the congregations by uniting them more closely in a common work; (2) the assistance of necessitous congregations by grants in aid of their work, and by any other means thought desirable; (3) the promotion of missionary work, and the spread of the principles and faith of liberal religion.

The Lord Mayor of Sheffield (Councillor A. J. Hobson), who is president of the Association, presided at the meeting, and explained that Leeds was the centre of so large a district that delegates from the churches in the Sheffield district had found that the attention of the greater number of delegates assembled was concentrated on matters more particularly affecting congregations in the neighbourhood of Leeds. That had tended against united action among the congregations in Sheffield and district. He recollected when the churches in Sheffield had belonged to the Midland Association, centred at Nottingham, as well as being connected with the Yorkshire Association, and the result had been some confusion. "We have tried various methods of association," he said, "and have finally adopted the truly English solution of doing the thing for ourselves." There was no doubt that in some of the more orthodox forms of the dissenting churches there was a great movement towards freedom in religion. So long as there was resistance and persecution, Unitarians grew and thrived, but when their ideas began to permeate other religious bodies there was no great increase of the Unitarian body as such; for these other churches had now become liberalised sufficiently to wish to retain those in their congregations whose views did not run in a particular groove. The position, therefore, was that the liberal religious movement was becoming widespread throughout the orthodox churches, and was less concentrated in their own body. It was very desirable that that fact should be recognised, and that they should try to draw together all those who held liberal views.

Mr. Edward Bramley said there was a great movement towards freedom among the churches generally, and he hoped that this Association might be the beginning of a true Free Church Union.

"The union of all who love in the service of all who suffer," was the description applied to the Association by the Rev. C. J. Street. It was to be an association of free churches, constituted of free souls uniting for friendly counsel and mutual support, and having a Divine mandate to carry the glad message of spiritual emancipation to the thousands who stood in need of it. It was not proposed that the Association should have any ecclesiastical powers, or that there should be the slightest implication that those who joined it were required to hold certain doctrinal belief.

"We are the leaders of the Christian Church," he declared. They had led the Christian Church in the past, and many of the churches were now standing on the ground which Unitarians had occupied a short time ago. They had a great ally in the spirit of modernism which was abroad in the churches, not excluding the Roman Catholic Church. "The future," he added, "is ours."

Dr. Mellor (Rotherham) said that on every side the cry was going up for more freedom—intellectual and spiritual freedom. The day was coming when Unitarians would see the realisation of that which had been their dream from the first moment of their history, the dream of a free communion, freely united to worship God in Spirit and in Truth. It was with this ideal in mind that the Association had been formed, and that ideal would be the power to carry it forward to a tremendous victory.

Other speeches followed, and a musical programme was provided by Mrs. A. King, Mrs. W. R. Stevenson, Mr. C. H. Dolphin, and Mr. H. R. Bramley.

At the inaugural business meeting, held in the afternoon, the whole of the following churches comprising the Association were represented:—Upper Chapel, Uppertorpe Unitarian, Attercliffe Unitarian, Stannington, Rotherham, Doncaster Free Christian Church, Barnsley Unitarian, Bolton-on-Dearne Free Congregational Church, Great Hucklow Unitarian, and Bradwell.

The Rev. C. J. Street and Mr. E. Bramley were elected vice-presidents, Mr. T. Beaumont treasurer, and the Rev. A. H. Dolphin secretary.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE DEANSGATE LECTURES.

MR. RICHARD ROBINSON presided over the third lecture at the Milton Hall, Deansgate, Manchester, on Tuesday evening last, when Professor H. T. Andrews gave an address on "Historical Christianity and Social Reform." The lecturer dealt mainly with the question whether modern civilisation as exemplified in great cities of to-day was happier than that of the great centres of population in pre-Christian times. "To what extent," he asked (says the abstract of his address in the Manchester Guardian), "had Christianity during the centuries of its existence succeeded in removing social wrongs and abuses and in raising the general level of human happiness? Some people said not at all, and he was willing to take up that challenge, pointing out, however, first of all, that real Christianity—the true embodiment of the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ—had not been in operation, as was currently said, for nineteen centuries. For centuries Jesus was eclipsed—a theological phrase, an ecclesiastical symbol. Nevertheless, the general mass of society was, in fact, happier than in pre-Christian times." Legal slavery and the amphitheatre had disappeared and there was more care for children and the sick. Christianity had played a great part in every forward movement of Christian times, and was the one unifying force in the dark ages. "Democracy was the child of the Reformation, for religious liberty was the mother of civil liberty." The social side of the evangelical revival of the eighteenth century, "the crusade against slavery, prison reform, the amendment of the penal code, and the Shaftesbury Factory Acts were all movements pushed on by the power of Christianity, and the temper of New Testament teaching was in the social gospels of Kingsley, Maurice, Carlyle, Ruskin and Arnold Toynbee. In the present social unrest Christianity would find the great opportunity of its history."

THE BRITISH INSTITUTE OF SOCIAL SERVICE.

The Institute has suffered a sad loss in the death of the Rev. A. H. Byles, who first suggested the idea of its official magazine, Progress, and was its honorary editor from the beginning—six years ago. His labours in this direction did not exhaust his energy, for he was a member of the Council and Executive Committee of the Institute, was a pioneer in the foundation of the Brotherhood Movement and Guilds of Help, and gave active assistance to many other useful social causes. On behalf of the Institute he made frequent journeys to the Continent to visit social institutions and to collect valuable information which was afterwards published in Progress. A pathetic interest attaches to the current number, which opens with an interesting and informing article by the late Mr. Byles on "Germany's Fight for Infant Life."

A CHILDREN'S GARDEN CITY.

To the same number of Progress we are indebted for a brief account of a Children's Garden City, organised by a Social Settlement in Worcester (Mass.), in the very midst of the worst and roughest part of the town. "Five acres of what had hitherto been used as a dumping ground for broken glass and crocks, meat tins, &c., has been cleared and its soil prepared mainly by the labour of the boys and girls of the district. Roads and lanes have been laid out, and 700 children have each received their own plot to cultivate. For each plot there is a charge of 2½d., but tools are lent and seeds given. The results have been marvellous. The 'City' has been organised into a self-governing community of young gardeners. They have their own mayor and other officers. The young urchins, who, before they became property owners themselves, thought nothing of appropriating that of others, have now learned to respect the laws of meum et tuum." The plan adopted at first was that of "set a thief to catch a thief," but now they have done better, they have converted him, and honesty rules throughout the community. Juvenile crime has been reduced by one half. (Italics ours.)

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Bury: Bank-street Chapel.—In referring to the events of the past year in the Bank-street Chapel Calendar, the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans says: "It has been the first time that any great united effort has been made by Bank-street congregation on behalf of the weaker churches, and the churches that are yet to be, in our North-East Lancashire district. The congregation is congratulated by all concerned upon the splendid results of their efforts, as well as on the magnificent spirit revealed; and, if I may be allowed to do so, I should like to thank you all most heartily for the fine manner in which you took the work up and carried it through. It is now a memory, but one that you will always cherish, of which you may always well be proud."

Chelmsford.—Under the auspices of the Southern Provincial Assembly a series of popular services has been arranged in a cinematograph hall, kindly placed at the disposal of the Legg-street congregation for the purpose by Mr. A. R. P. Hickley. The first service was held last Sunday evening. The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, of Chatham, was the preacher, and there were over 200 people present. The Revs. J. A. Pearson, T. P. Spedding, C. Roper, A. H. Biggs, and W. H. Drummond are announced to take the other services of the series.

Clifton: Oakfield-road Church.—At the annual meeting of the congregation of Oakfield-road Church on Saturday, Jan. 20, a presentation was made to the treasurer, Mr. Charles Cole, and Mrs. Cole, in recognition of their services during the past four years. In the unavoidable absence of Mr. P. J. Worsley, Dr. Beckh presented the gifts for which the members of the church had subscribed.

Hounslow.—Services have been carried on at Hounslow by the London District Unitarian Society on Sunday evenings since November 19. The preachers have been the Rev. George Critchley, B.A., the Rev. T. P. Spedding, Messrs. E. Capleton, W. T. Colyer, and the District Minister. In spite of extensive advertising by means of handbills, cards, and personal visits the attendances have been very small, and, for the present, the services have been suspended. If there is any effort on the part of the people on the spot to organise services the District Minister, the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, will be glad to help to find preachers and himself take part in the work.

Lewisham.—At the invitation of the Lewisham congregation, of which the Rev. W. W. C. Pope is minister, the congregations of Woolwich, Brixton, Peckham, and Bermondsey were represented at an inter-congregational gathering in the fine new school in the High-street on Friday, January 19. After a social half-hour, during which visitors were introduced to each other and to their hosts, the chair was taken by Dr. W. Blake Odgers, President of the London District Unitarian Society. In his usual happy vein he opened the proceedings, and expressed the hope that this would be the first of many such meetings. They wanted more churches south of the Thames. The other speakers were the Revs. W. W. C. Pope, W. C. Bowie, and Douglas Robson, Mr. Caley (Bermondsey), and Mr. Elsdon (Woolwich). Solos were sung by Mr. Paton, Mrs. Griffin, and Mrs. Carrington from the Lewisham Church; and Mr. Clarence Davis of the Peckham Church. The weather was not favourable, but there was a good attendance.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street Schools.—At the annual meeting of the congregation, which was held at the close of the evening service on Sunday, Jan. 21, reference was made to the resignation of the minister, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, and a resolution was passed expressing the regret of the congregation, and their appreciation of the work he had done as minister of the church and superintendent of the Sunday school. Mr. Cobden Smith, who presided, thanked the members for this expression of their goodwill, and for the encouragement and inspiration which they had continually given him. A letter was read from Mr. A. E. Steinthal, the hon. secretary of the schools, containing suggestions which were being considered for bringing the congregation into closer union with Cross-street Chapel. The members would be asked to decide whether they would prefer to attend the evening services of the chapel, as it was proposed that the new minister to be appointed at Cross-street should become the minister of both chapel and schools, and thus return to the custom of former years.

National Unitarian Temperance Association.—Owing to the pressure of other work, Mr. W. R. Marshall has been compelled to send in his resignation of the position of Organising Secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association. During the ten years that Mr. Marshall filled the office he carried out his duties faithfully and well, and the Committee are very sorry to have to accept his resignation. The honorary secretary, Mr. E. F. Cowlin, has been appointed secretary of the Association as from the 1st inst.

Poole (Resignation).—The Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A. has resigned the pulpit of the Hill-street Unitarian Church, which he has held for the past four years, and is retiring, on grounds of ill-health, from the active work of the ministry. The resignation is to take effect at midsummer. Mr. Solly first entered on the work of the ministry at Padiham, in 1874, and subsequently held charges at the Beaufort-street Domestic Mission in Liverpool (now the Mill-street Mission), at Southampton and at Bridport, which was the scene of his longest ministry. He intends still to reside at Parkstone, and as an occasional preacher, as his strength permits, and a member of the Southern Unitarian Association, of which he is now President, he will still be able to render welcome services to the cause of liberal religion in the district.

Southern Unitarian Association.—In connection with the quarterly meeting of the Executive of the Southern Unitarian Association at Southampton, on Wednesday, January 17, an address was given in the Church of the Saviour by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead, on "Is Liberal Christianity a Failure?"

The Rev. H. S. Solly, President of the Association, took the chair, and after an opening hymn, congratulated the congregation on the successful effort they had made for the renovation and redecoration of their church. The church was worthy of such efforts, and they had there a fine tradition to maintain. It was a great satisfaction that the work was not only done, with the happy result they saw, but was paid for. Mr. Gow, at the opening of his address, said that the subject had been suggested by a brilliant pamphlet by Professor Burkitt, of Cambridge, on "The Failure of Liberal Christianity," which was a question-begging phrase. He quoted a saying of Darwin's, "Great is the power of steady misrepresentation," and said that if a thing was often enough repeated, thousands of people would be found to believe it, without any reason. Burkitt's pamphlet was inspired by Schweitzer's work, which gave an account of the successive studies of the life of Jesus, and in his own conclusions he strongly emphasised the eschatological element in the belief and teaching of Jesus. Schweitzer's representation, Mr. Gow held, set before them a person utterly incapable of producing the effect which the life of Jesus had actually produced; his teaching as a whole could not be forced into the eschatological mould. The real Jesus, like all the great things of the world, might evade their grasp, but that was not because he was a mere phantom, it was because his life was in relation to the divine and the eternal, which they apprehended, if they could not altogether comprehend. A cordial vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and seconded by the Rev. A. R. Andreae, was accorded to Mr. Gow for his address.

West Bromwich: The late Rev. J. Harrison.—The tablet erected in Lodge-road Unitarian Church, West Bromwich, in memory of the late Rev. John Harrison was unveiled on Sunday morning, January 21, by the Mayor (Councillor J. Archibald Kenrick), who was accompanied by the Mayoress (Mrs. Kenrick). There was a large congregation. The sermon was preached by the pastor (the Rev. F. A. Homer) on the words "We ought to obey God rather than men." Towards the end of his discourse Mr. Homer remarked that the man whose memory they were honouring that day felt, like many another, the force of new thought working within him, and he also felt that it would be dishonouring God, it would be dishonouring his own nature, if he stifled the thoughts. Cost what it might, he must say good-bye to the church in which he had been reared, and in which he had worked, and find a new spiritual home among strangers. And so John Harrison definitely ranged himself on the side of those who in all ages had felt that they must obey God rather than man, and that God demanded of all his children absolute loyalty to the voice within. And his reward for standing fast to truth was an ever-increasing vision of truth, and an ever-increasing respect, influence, esteem in the hearts of all who knew him; and in the distant parts of the world to-day there were those who thanked God that John Harrison ever lived, and had touched their lives. They met there to do honour to one who laid himself out to be of use to all the citizens in their town, and to those in the country generally. And in so doing they must remember that the fight which John Harrison had was a much more severe fight than perhaps they realised at the present time. He was keenly interested in the raising of the working classes, and in his association with the Working Men's Club he did invaluable work. As a member of the old School Board he was ever for the uplifting of the masses, for increasing the volume of education, and for teaching people to be strong and moral. In addition to that, there was no greater supporter in West Bromwich than John Harrison of the higher education of the people. The tablet is of hammered copper, with a medallion head of Mr. Harrison in the centre. The inscription runs: "Erected to the memory of the Rev. John Harrison, the first and for 21 years pastor of this church, from 1874 to 1895. His interests, unflinching devotion to duty, loyalty to conscience, his earnest public work and kindly nature endeared him to all."

Christ calls us not to come by creed
But by the truthful faith of deed."

The Mayor mentioned that the whole of the work with regard to the tablet had been carried out in West Bromwich.

Woolwich: Carmel Chapel.—The annual meeting of the Fellowship took place on Tuesday evening. A report of the work of the Fellowship was given by the secretary, Mr. F. Elsdon. There are signs of renewed activity and interest on the part of the members, and a bright outlook for the coming year is anticipated. The Rev. J. A. Pearson was present, having been invited to address the meeting, and gave a very encouraging address.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE RECORD OF A BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

A little book, published for private circulation, which contains the beautiful record of Mrs. Ramsay Macdonald's life, has already been noticed in the press, and therefore it is no intrusion on the privacy of a grief that gives pathos to every line to quote some passages from this tender memorial of the dead. It is the story, simply told, of a woman's life which was devoted to public service, yet not in such a way as to deprive her home, her husband, and her children of the love and sympathy which she was always ready to bestow abundantly. She was particularly interested in securing the free development of her children's personalities, and sought to surround them "with warmth and light and the nourishment of her own example as a faithful working and believing woman," so that they might grow in grace and strength as naturally as the flowers.

Her Socialism was "no wrathful resentment of class. It was a dream of the City of God wrapt in peace, with its open gates rising upon the horizon. It was a part of her religion. At fifteen she said that she wanted to live the Sermon on the Mount." In this spirit she entered upon the special work with which her name will always be associated. "No drudgery was too great or unpleasant for her. In all weathers she trudged up and down mean streets, winning the confidence of the people, . . . going out when the world was sleeping to see the women unprotected by factory legislation labouring in the dead hours of the night, entering public-houses so that she might come into touch with something of the life both before and behind the bars, searching along labyrinthine stairs and passages for someone who she had heard was in distress. She founded the Women's Labour League in the same spirit as the pure knight rode out to free damsels cursed under evil spells."

We may, perhaps, be pardoned for quoting at length a passage which reveals the deep longing in the hearts of two strenuous workers for the well-earned rest they were destined never to reach together:—"On the edge of the moor at Lossiemouth, on a ridge overlooking the sea, and commanding wide views of wood and field and distant hill, we built the habitation upon the walls of which we were to hang the swords and spears of our conflicts, and where in peace we were to end our days. She was particularly fond of the simple peasant songs of Scotland, with their romantic love, glad some lilt, and domestic felicity. They are standing shelf upon shelf waiting for us, gathered from many bookstalls, and selected from many catalogues. Everything is ready for our homecoming—for that evening of rest. There we were to bid adieu to each other when the time came, and under the shadow of the old grey castle on the hill of Spynie, where my people sleep, we were to be joined through the long night of waiting. But there was no twilight in her day. Noonday suddenly failed in night. Though she is here in every room of the place we built her step will never again sound within it, and her voice will never again welcome her children to its hearthstones."

SHIPBUILDING IN GREAT BRITAIN.

The annual summary issued by Lloyd's shows how the boom in trade has been reflected in the shipyards. The following tonnage totals give some idea as to the way in which the output of the United Kingdom compares with foreign countries: United Kingdom 1,803,844, Germany 255,532, America 171,569, France 125,472, Holland, 93,050, Japan 44,359, Austria-Hungary 37,836, Norway 35,435. The United Kingdom's tonnage represents 772 vessels, exclusive of warships. The latter, numbering fifty, add 230,786 tons to the aggregate, and thus show the total output of this country to have reached the vast figure of 2,034,830 tons.

THE VILLAGE WEAVER IN INDIA.

When so much is being said in many quarters about the noble work of Empire-building, the efforts made by the Salvation Army to promote village industries in India should not be overlooked, for they have an important bearing on national development. Commissioner Booth-Tucker, or Fakir Singh, who has recently arrived in England for a short visit with his wife, has given some details to a Times representative. "If the weavers went down before the competition of Manchester and Bombay mills," he said, "the whole village community would suffer from the lack of help at ripening time when the crops have to be watched night and day. So we not only help the weaver by getting cotton and silk and wool for him at bottom prices, but supply him with an improved rapid hand-loom of our own invention, which enables him to compete with the mills."

"We carry on nineteen weaving schools of our own, and we have organised about twenty for other people. In the Punjab, the Government asked us to start a school, and lent us the disused fort in Ludhiana, besides giving us a monthly grant. In the past year 97 students have passed through the school and gone out to teach others. The chief Government weaving schools have adopted our loom. We are now making spinning-wheels, so that the weavers can get better yarn than they can buy from the mills." It may be added that the influence of this movement extends as far as Central Africa. "A missionary lady," according to a report on the Ludhiana Weaving School, "was sent by her bishop from Uganda to spend six weeks with us studying our methods, and has since sent us excellent samples of cotton grown, spun, and woven in Uganda."

GROWTH OF THE PLAY-CENTRE MOVEMENT.

Mrs. Humphry Ward has again appealed, through the columns of the Times, on behalf of the Evening Play-Centres Committee, which is greatly in need of funds owing to the fact that its work is steadily increasing and that it has a deficit of nearly £400 on last year's working. In the course of an interesting letter she states that the attendances at eighteen play-centres (including the Tavistock-place Recreation School) and at fifty organised playgrounds opened during the holiday month of August, have amounted in round numbers to 1,650,000, as compared with 200,000 five years ago. This means that about 18,000 elementary school children have been in regular attendance at the eighteen play-centres, and that from 20,000 to 25,000 other children attended the organised playgrounds during the holiday month. There is no need to emphasise the value of Mrs. Humphry Ward's efforts on behalf of thousands of children in London who would otherwise have no other place to play in than the gutter. It is an admirable attempt to bring some brightness into their lives, and save them from some of the worst influences of the street or alley, which deserves the most generous support.

THE PROTECTION OF INDIAN CATTLE.

At a recent meeting of the Committee of the British Association for the Protection of Indian Cattle, an influential body lately formed in London, the following aims and objects were framed:—(1) To prevent the unnecessary slaughter of cattle in India with the view of increasing the number and improving the breed of the animals employed for the cultivation of the land. (2) By this means to encourage the agricultural development of the country and so render the United Kingdom less dependent upon foreign countries for her raw material. (3) To improve the general condition and promote the more humane treatment of cattle in India. Membership (which is free) is invited by the President, Mr. K. S. Jassawalla, and those interested in this humane cause are requested to write to him at 45, Courthope-road, Hampstead, N.W.

EIGHTH NATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

The National Peace Council has made arrangements for the Eighth National Peace Congress to be held in London on May 15, 16, 17, and 18 next. The Council is desirous of securing as large an attendance as possible at the Congress, which is meeting for the first time in London. Representatives are cordially invited from every organisation in sympathy with the aims and objects of the International Peace Movement.

A NEW INNOVATION.

THE HOME TYPEWRITER.

ONE TO BE LOANED TO EVERY BRITISH HOME FOR A ONE WEEK'S FREE TRIAL.

It was Mr. Norman Angell, the author of "The Great Illusion," who said in a recent interview:

"The progress of any nation depends entirely upon the rapidity with which the general community can absorb new ideas."

This is especially applicable to the subject dealt with here, inasmuch as it applies to the general community rather than the few, and as, apart from its usefulness and necessity, it possesses possibilities of an educative value to the younger generation which cannot be over-estimated.

No one can discredit the importance of the typewriter in the home, a problem which has lately been solved by the Blick Co., Ltd., of Cheapside, London, with branches in all large towns and cities. A durable, sound, and in every respect a practical writing machine capable of hardest and roughest usage; in fact, a perfect typewriter has been produced for the home, and at a price within the reach of all, £5 17s. 6d. complete in case.

It is, therefore, safe to say that the real usefulness of the writing machine (hitherto associated for the greater part with offices) has only now commenced to dawn upon us, just as the importance of the first typewriter dawned upon our fathers about fifty years ago.

To quote from an article appearing on October 23, headed "Too Young at Sixty": "When Jobson" (whoever he may have been) "first heard the click of the typewriter he said: 'Take that confounded thing away.'" To-day the office in which the happy and busy click—click of the typewriter is not heard is a sure indication that there is little if any business going on.

KEEP ABREAST OF THE TIMES.

The one and great idea of the present generation is to keep abreast of the times, and it can be a foregone conclusion that the important necessity of the typewriter in the home will be as generally realised as that of the sewing machine.

Firstly, because of its manifold advantages to the grown-ups, and secondly, because of its great educative value to children of the house, whether boys or girls.

Once in every little while comes some new aid to the progressive—every little while some new idea crops up for the advancement of the present and future generation; those who grasp them keep abreast with the times, while those who turn a "deaf ear"—or should we say a "blind eye?"—to these new and important innovations lose opportunities that vanish with passing years, never to return.

At present we have a "Lord Mayor of London" whose years number 81. And how is it? Simply because he has kept abreast of the times, absorbing and utilising all that makes for progress, instead of, Jobsonlike, scorning new innovations and inventions which lay the cornerstones of great successes, if accepted, or otherwise become the tombstones of our defeat.

The advent of the practical hometype-writer has long been considered inevitable. It was only left to those sufficiently enterprising to bring the price of this valuable writing machine within reach of the masses, and, at the same time, a machine calculated to withstand the hardest usage and do the most perfect work—one that could be offered with the same guarantee of reliability and durability as the most expensive typewriters.

THE GROWING UPS AND THE GROWN.

Hundreds of instances could be cited where the practical necessity of the writing machine in the home is strongly manifested; space does not permit us to dwell at length upon the subject. We may mention two, however, as striking examples.

One—the father whose business or profession may or may not call him to his office daily, yet who wisely keeps in touch with his affairs; there stands the ever-ready typewriter to communicate his wishes and record his thoughts simply by touching its obedient and never-failing keys. He may use it himself or take example from the photo reproduced and dictate to his son, the triple usefulness of the typewriter to the boy is at once apparent.

A. Every letter dictated to his son who puts it on paper clearly and concisely gives the boy a knowledge that every lad should possess, viz., the writing of business letters, concise, unmistakable, and to the point;

B. He keeps his son, who may some day be called upon to take his father's place in the battle of life, au fait with his affairs;

C. It affords the youngster a knowledge that, should he be destined for a business career, gives him an early start—a great advantage over his younger rivals, and therefore a more rapid progress in the walk of life. The same may be applied to girls.

The second instance may be said to concern children in general, and with this in mind the manufacturers have built the Home Model Blick, recognising that delicate and tiny hands "hit hard" when the recipient of the blow is a typewriter requiring only the merest touch.

In no quicker way can a child be taught its lessons and the alphabet than on a typewriter, and as soon as he or she has learned to spell, compose words and sentences, practice is only then needed to develop a practical use of the machine.

EVERYONE TO KNOW HOW TO USE A TYPEWRITER.

EVERY HOME TO POSSESS ONE.

Feeling that once the general public recognises the value of a typewriter in the home its adoption will be universal, the Blick Co., Ltd., of 9 and 10, Cheapside London, E.C., and 369, Oxford-street, W., offers to send a Home Model Blick to any and every British home at their own expense for one week's free trial, carriage paid both ways, and at the end of the week, if you do not want to retain it, send it back by your local carrier or by post and no questions will be asked, nor will you be bothered by agents or canvassers. You'll only be classed as "Jobson's," who said, "Take the confounded thing away."

But suppose you are more progressive, and whilst desiring its possession, do not want to pay for it cash down. Then you can purchase it on the easy-payment system. Send for your free week's trial of the Home Typewriter to-day. It will be sent to you by return, all packed in its neat, polished chestnut wood case. A beautifully illustrated booklet, No. 92, telling you all about it, and how the idea came about, will be sent with the machine. So easy it is to use the Home Model Blick that the company will teach every purchaser how to operate it in half an hour.

The Peace Year-Book for 1912 (1s. net), which is edited by Mr. Carl Heath, and published by the National Peace Council, 167, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, is a very welcome addition to the reference book-shelf. It contains much valuable information about various peace and arbitration organisations, a Pacifist Peace Directory, Bibliography, facts relating to the preparations for war, extracts from notable speeches in 1911, and details of congresses and conferences (including the First Universal Races Congress, dealt with by Mr. G. Spiller), also a number of instructive articles by such well-known advocates of peace as Mr. Norman Angell, Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P., Lord Weardale, Sir John Macdonnell, Mr. G. H. Perris, M. Jacques Dumas, Pastor Umfrid and others. We are glad that a plea has been put in for the horses who are mutilated and killed in war by Mr. H. S. Salt, the hon. secretary of the Humanitarian League. He reminds us that in time of war more injuries are inflicted on horses in a week than those recorded in the lists of the R.S.P.C.A. in a year, and it may be recalled that during the South African war over 400,000 horses were killed and wounded. The editor, in his interesting summary of the progress of the Peace Movement in 1911, refers to the unhappy fact that a year which began with the encouraging hope that three great nations, at least, were prepared for the abolition of war, ended in a gathering of the war-clouds in Southern Europe. Nevertheless, the cause of peace is advancing, and the various central and local organisations throughout the country have grown in size and influence.

LONGSIGHT FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, MANCHESTER.

Appeal and Bazaar Fund, 1911-12.
Special Effort to Raise £1,250.

*The Bazaar to be held
November 6, 7, 8 and 9.*

In submitting our appeal we have the following objects in view:—

(1) LIQUIDATION OF DEBT.—On certain property belonging to the Church there is a mortgage of £550, the balance of an original mortgage of £850.

(2) A NEW ORGAN.—We have hitherto struggled to maintain a good musical standard in our services. To this end we have been generously and effectively helped by an unpaid choir and organist. For the continuance of a reasonable efficiency we now require a new organ. The old organ has done splendid service; but it was not new when bought by us, and it has served us 28 years.

(3) RENOVATION AND REPAIRS.—The Church and Schools stand in real need of renovation. They are a splendid and substantial block of buildings, and attention paid to them now will be a genuine economy, likely to be felt for many years to come. Since the appeal was drafted the Sanitary Committee of the Corporation have given notice that the drainage requires certain alterations which will involve considerable outlay.

FOR THESE PURPOSES WE DESIRE TO RAISE £1,250.

The Congregation and Elder Scholars of the Sunday School have already promised donations amounting to the sum of £275.

For those in a position to consider our claims in another aspect, a word or two further may not be unwelcome.

The property already referred to represents the first effort of our Church to secure premises suitable to its growing needs, and to the dignity of its aim. The site on which it stands was bought with the intention of building a Church upon it. However, the site on which the Church now stands was thought a better one and the earlier site was turned to what would by now have been an excellent investment, had not the financial needs of the Church postponed the full liquidation of the mortgage. That the scheme was a sound one from the beginning is testified by the fact that the late Mr. R. D. Darbishire supported it heartily, and advanced the first mortgage upon it. The foresight which determined the change has been almost strangely justified. Town developments have made our present situation an ideal one. On the other hand, the old site would by now have been almost entirely unsuitable for Church purposes.

Another feature of our past we may venture to name as bearing upon the spirit of our appeal:—The Church has struggled hard to avoid becoming a burden to denominational funds. Official records dealing with its beginnings show this in words other than our own. Begun in 1866 on the initiative of a few earnest souls, without wealth or social influence, it has all along striven to be self-supporting, and has been for more than 20 years entirely independent of outside aid. This condition of things we aspire to maintain. We believe our aspiration will command your active sympathy.

At the present moment we stand at what we believe is a fruitful crisis in our Church life. The labours and sacrifices of the past have earned for us a great opportunity. This opportunity may either be frittered away or utilised decisively. We have fine Church and School premises worth about £7,000. We have a growing congregation, consisting to a remarkable extent of men and women not hitherto connected with liberal Christianity. We have, too, an able and willing staff of workers. In short, we can pledge ourselves to an effort worthy of your generous support.

Our future is a promising one. Unlike many city Churches, our position will assure rather than threaten our prosperity for many years to come. The neighbourhood is a residential one, offering a fine field for enlightened progressive religious work. So far as can be seen, adequate assistance at this crisis of our Church life would set us free for purely spiritual work for another generation.

In conclusion, we humbly pledge ourselves to do all that earnest and prayerful effort and sacrifice can do to justify any consideration and practical aid you may extend to our undertaking.

The appeal has received the endorsement and commendation of the following:—The British and Foreign Unitarian Association and a donation of £50 conditional upon £1,200 being raised; The Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches and donation of £30; and the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., President of the National Conference.

PAUL

His Life and Teaching.

By JAMES DRUMMOND,
M.A., LL.D., Hon. D.Litt., D.D.

Cloth 1/6 net. Postage 3d.

This little volume is intended to introduce teachers and elder scholars in Sunday Schools to the writings and teachings of the Apostle Paul, and especially to bring home some of his lofty spiritual ideas to their hearts and minds. . . . It is adapted only to classes which have reached some maturity of thought and religious experience. Though there are chapters in the Epistles which may benefit a child, the discussions contained in them can, as a rule, appeal only to adults. Among these discussions I have endeavoured to select those which express most clearly the religious principles which ought to guide our daily conduct.—From Preface.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE condition of affairs in Persia and our own share of responsibility for them continues to be a matter of supreme moment. The speech which Mr. Shuster made in London on Monday was remarkably calm and judicial in tone, and quite free from the note of personal resentment, and has evidently made a deep impression. It is no doubt very inconvenient from the point of view of official diplomacy that small nationalities should claim some consideration in international bargains, and that Persia should have chosen this particular moment for a serious effort to obtain constitutional liberties and financial reform. But people who cannot divorce political convenience from the claims of justice will read the following description with painful interest: "They are a Mahometan people, yet in matters of government they have done something which no other nation could have done. They have adopted the wholesome ethical code of the most enlightened peoples. They know in general terms that we believe in the Ten Commandments. In their simple child-like minds they cannot understand how a people believing in the Ten Commandments could treat them in the way in which they have been treated. They don't understand that international politics have not time for the Ten Commandments."

In an interview which was published in the Manchester Guardian on Thursday Mr. Shuster answered some criticisms of himself, and some aspersions of the Mejliss, which have appeared in the press. The Times, for instance, has done its best to belittle the representative character of the Mejliss and its constitutional importance. To this Mr. Shuster replies that it was the most representative Governmental body that had ever existed in Persia. It was as representative as it could be under the circumstances, and for a young and struggling Parliament it was marked by courage and independence. "No one who has not been in Persia," he says, "can realise the absolute dread in which the heavy hand of Russia is held there, or can realise how powerful the motive must have been which inspired these men to stand out day after day and week after week, and resist the demand, backed by bribery and intimidation, that they should surrender their independence."

THE announcement, which we make in another column, of the proposal to form an International League for the protection of the rights and liberties of the smaller nationalities, is one of unusual interest and importance at the present time. The preliminary list of names, representative not of official politics or organised religious opinion but of many of the most serious elements in the intellectual life of Europe, will command respect. The first object of the League will be to organise a bureau of information in regard to all small nationalities which are threatened with loss of liberty or any encroachment upon their independence by their more powerful neighbours. At present there is too much reason to believe that the information which is supplied to the European press on these subjects comes, as a rule, from tainted sources. Further, it is hoped that the League will be an important agency in organising an international moral sentiment, which politicians may dislike but cannot ignore, as an important factor in every conflict between the strong and the weak.

WITH Mr. McKenna's speech last week, in which he gave an outline of the Government's proposals, Welsh Disestablishment has again entered the arena of acute and earnest controversy. The crux of the situation is that Disestablishment must be accompanied by some measure of Disendowment, and it is around this question that the real conflict will be joined. Few people at the present day are much affected by the plea that it is the national recognition of Christianity which is at stake, or that the spiritual efficiency of the Church as a bulwark against the secularisation of the State depends upon its establishment.

THE Government proposal is to disendow the Church in Wales, subject to existing life interests, of an income of £181,000 a year, and to restore it to definitely national purposes. The greater part of this sum is derived from tithes, and tithes in Wales, Mr. McKenna contended, were not the offspring of piety, but the creation of law. They were a tax appropriated to the use of a Church at a time when it was national. When the Church ceased to be national it was not merely within the jurisdiction, but it was the duty of Parliament to appropriate the proceeds of the tax to national purposes. It is the intention to leave the churches and parsonage houses in the possession of the disestablished Church. These with the endowments and other public sources of income which remain will still leave the Church of England the most richly endowed church in Wales.

AFTER Disestablishment, Mr. McKenna asked, what would be the position of the English Church in Wales? It would be the same as that of the Irish Church. It would be the same as that of the eight other Churches in Scotland, the United States, our Dominions, and our Colonies, no one of which was established and all of which enjoyed inter-communion and close ecclesiastical relations with the Established Church in England. It would be reverting to the position in which the Welsh Church stood in relation to the English prior to the twelfth century. The regulations for the general management and good government of the Church in Wales and her property would be in the hands of a representative body with whose freedom of action and choice of means nobody would desire to interfere. The spiritual entity of the Church need not be touched. He believed the fears of Churchmen as to the loss of influence and vitality were devoid of all foundation. The very same forebodings were expressed with regard to the Disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1869, and they had proved to be utterly groundless. A little courage, a little faith, and they would see the Church of England in Wales taking her rightful place in a sisterhood of free Churches.

AN announcement was made in the Osservatore Romano on Monday, that Mgr. Duchesne's "L'Histoire Ancienne de l'Eglise" has been placed on the Index. This is the end of a controversy which has been hanging in the balance for a considerable time and marks another stage in the campaign of the bureaucracy at the Vatican against scholarship. A book which was commended by the Pope himself on its first appearance and has been used widely as a text-book in the French seminaries is thus banned officially as dangerous to faith. It seems probable that the Pope's advisers never made acquaintance with it till it appeared in an Italian translation. There will be a good deal of curiosity about Mgr. Duchesne's attitude. It will be hard for him to retain his high ecclesiastical dignity without a formal act of submission, but as Director of the French School in Rome and a recent member of the Académie Française, he stands to lose a good deal in reputation and esteem if he yields to intellectual tyranny.

THERE seems to be no reason to doubt the statement, which has been communicated to a Belgian paper, that the Supreme (Civil) Court of Madrid has declared Francisco Ferrer to be innocent of the charges of conspiracy, riot, and insurrection for which he was condemned and shot. On the ground of his innocence, his confiscated property is to be restored to his heirs. It is a tardy act of reparation, which does nothing to mitigate the injustice of his execution. But it affords a remarkable and unexpected justification of the attitude of those organs of public opinion—we are glad to think that we were of the number—who made a strong protest against this act of barbarism at the time, with its hideous paraphernalia of a hasty and secret military trial.

THE unveiling of the Bunyan Memorial in Westminster Abbey has been made the occasion of a chorus of approval of the happy and fraternal relations between the Church of England clergy and the Non-conformist ministers who were present. It is considered to be almost a spectacle for angels that the Archbishop of Canterbury and Dr. Clifford should walk together in the Abbey. We wish that we could take these things more naturally and simply, or reserve our surprise for the occasions when ministers of the Gospel do not treat one another with mutual sympathy, courtesy, and goodwill. But we may take it as an illustration of the power of a common homage to a great personality to create an atmosphere of mutual understanding. The secret of Bunyan's enduring fascination could not be put more aptly or tersely than was done on Thursday by a writer in The Times: "The Pilgrim's Progress" produces as strong an illusion of reality as any realistic novel because its allegorical form is only a means of relating things that had really happened to Bunyan himself."

A LETTER on "Filial Impiety," which Miss Violet Markham has sent to The Times will be welcomed by all friends of clear and tolerant thinking. It is often assumed that any change either in politics or religion is lacking in reverence for our ancestry. Loyalty is supposed to involve a certain stationariness of mind, or a parrot-like repetition of inherited phrases. Against this use of the "dead hand," either in controversy or our daily habits, the assumption that true loyalty to the dead consists "in putting up mental shutters round the house of life and dwelling therein in a stultifying imperviousness to new ideas," Miss Markham makes her protest. "The living principle of one generation," she says, "unless constantly tested in the light of new conditions, may become with fatal ease the moribund prejudice of the next. Our daily sacrifice on the altar of memory should be that of a present faith building up new forms of life, not an offering of dried husks from which the spirit has long since fled. The man who boasts with conscious pride that he has never changed his mind is probably in that happy position because he has no mind worth speaking of to change."

THE annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was held in Manchester on Wednesday, and encouraging reports were presented of its progress and usefulness. A special welcome was given to Dr. Mellone and the Rev. H. D. McLachlan on their assuming the duties of "Principal" and "Tutor and Warden" respectively. We hope to give some account of the proceedings next week.

THE CHURCH AND THE AGE.

WE think that the Dean of St. Paul's has a just ground of complaint against the newspaper reporter on the prowl for copy. It will be remembered that he gave a course of lectures at Sion College a short time ago to a small society of ladies. His recent accession to his high dignity in London put the newspapers on the alert, but instead of publishing careful abstracts of the lectures they scattered broadcast a few striking sentences or unconventional judgments torn from their context, and straightway denounced him as a pessimist and labelled him "the gloomy dean." In deference to a strongly expressed desire, Dr. INGE has now published his lectures,* though he is careful to tell us that they were not written with a view to publication. Anyone who will take the trouble to read them will be bound to pay a tribute to their vigour of thought, their plainness of speech, and their deep spiritual convictions, however much some of the statements and conclusions may provoke him to dissent.

Dr. INGE makes a shrewd guess at the reason of the chorus of public disapproval. He did not say what he was expected to say. He retailed none of the platitudes of the facile optimist. He refused to be a prophet of smooth things. Believing as he does that in our enlightened age, which scatters flowers every day at the shrine of progress, men are still capable of self-deception, and that "there is much in the prevailing tone and temper of modern thought which is a standing menace to the Christian spirit," he has the courage to say so. For ourselves, we are grateful for the warning that the newest catchwords are not necessarily of divine authority, though some of them may have less alloy in them than Dr. INGE thinks he has discovered. If we have a ground of complaint at all it is not against his trenchant obiter dicta about democracy or modernism, though we disagree with them profoundly. We can do without complacent echoes of our own opinions, but we seem to miss the enrichment of mind by deep human sympathy even for the failures and the fools, without which there is danger that the wholeness of truth may be sacrificed to intellectual clearness and critical subtlety, or it may be to the angularities of a purely individual judgment.

The newspapers are probably tired of rending the Dean of St. Paul's by this time. It will now be the turn of the ecclesiastics and of all well-mannered religious people who walk in the strict ways of party loyalty and sectarian zeal. For he reveals himself on almost every page of this book as impatient of all the fashionable ways of making religion popular. "The living Spirit of CHRIST," he says, "is plainly no respecter of persons or of denominations; and it is this living Spirit which must be the guide and teacher of the Church of the future." His object is to prove that "the Spirit of the Ages is a much better Spirit to co-operate with than the Spirits of this particular Age." He reminds us that God is "infinitely prodigal of time," and that civilisation is probably still only in its childhood. In face of our impatience to see the Millennium next year he tells us that the Church "has only begun to crawl and babble. Her life lies before her, not behind her. The 'traditions of the first six centuries' are the traditions of the rattle and the feeding bottle." Nor does he show himself any more tender towards the dominant ambitions and ideals of the Catholic party in the Church of England.

"Our own Church is a characteristically insular institution, which evades all classification. In its present shape it was the product of a political compromise which was so framed as to include Catholics who would renounce the Pope, and Puritans who were not anarchists on principle. It is officially Protestant, and dislikes the name. It has framed tests of Catholicity which separate it from the non-Episcopalian Churches, and which are scornfully rejected by all other Catholics. It has been, in a word, the Church of the honestest and most illogical nation on the face of the globe."

Here again is his trenchant description of the scheme for fraternal union between the Church of England and the Greek Church, which a few people are trying to revive at the present moment in connection with the English visit to Russia.

"We do not hear so much now of a rapprochement with the Eastern Church, a very pleasing and romantic idea, especially to those who, like myself, very much prefer the Greek Fathers and their theology to the Latin. . . . I cannot think that we should gain much by associating with the State-Church of a semi-barbarous autocracy, sunk in intellectual torpor and gross superstition. The notion almost reminds us of the cruel jest of Mezentius, who bound the living bodies of his enemies to corpses."

We have not quoted these passages in order to try to find another label for the Dean of St. Paul's, but simply to illustrate the trenchant candour with which he seeks to dethrone the idols of the Church as well as those of the market-place. If they have in them some of the zeal of the iconoclast and the almost uncanny dread of any form of self-deception which is often the lot of the lonely thinker, it must not be forgotten that behind them there is the glow of a noble spiritual passion. He desires above everything else "to hold up the Christian view of life, the Christian standard of values, steadily before the eyes of our generation." Christ for him "has transformed all values in the light of our divine sonship and heavenly citizenship." The thought of this heavenly citizenship reminds him how the divisions in the Church of CHRIST disappear in the chambers where men shut their door and pray to their Father who is in secret. "The mystics all tell the same tale. They have climbed the same mountain, and their witness agrees together." "No Church that can produce saints is spiritually dead or morally bankrupt." It is in the light of this purpose and conviction, and not by its occasional lapses into exaggeration or provocative phrasing that the value of his message must be judged. Even in religion we cannot dispense with the acid of thought when it bites deep into the earthly dross and reveals the bright gold of the Gospel.

A FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE.

CHARLES DICKENS,
BORN FEBRUARY 7, 1812.

IN my last year at Trinity Hall, Charles Dickens came down to Cambridge and read portions of his works at the Guildhall. It was in the spring of 1870. He read with intense tragic power the story of the murder of Nancy; then, with irresistible humour, the account of Mr. Pecksniff's visit to Kingsgate-street, High Holborn, where Mrs. Gamp resided, and the conversation of that lady with Betsy Prigg. Last came "Boots at the Holly Tree Inn." No child of eight in the present day would ever talk as Master Harry Walmers, jun., does in this story. Yet it is a charming little idyll, and Dickens dwelt with special affection on the women "seven deep at the key-hole," and the soft-hearted chambermaid who cried out, "'Tis a shame to part them!" At this time there was at Trinity Hall with me Henry Fielding Dickens (now a brother K.C.), the youngest son of the great novelist. He kindly lent me the parts of "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" as they came out in their paper covers; to the pictures on these covers some critics attach great importance. I read these parts with great interest, and formed the opinion, to which I have ever since adhered, that Mr. Datchery, who came to Cloisterham in a white wig in Chapter xviii, was not Edwin Drood, but Mr. Grewgious' clerk, Bazzard, in disguise.

On June 9, 1870, I came down to town from Cambridge. Early the next morning, as I walked from my hotel in Queen-square, Bloomsbury, towards Gray's Inn, I was startled by the newspaper placards which announced the "Death of Charles Dickens." This was a shock to me, as it was to all London. Next I noticed a little stationer's shop—in Lamb's Conduit-street, I think—where a sheet of black-edged note paper was placed in the window with a photograph of Charles Dickens stuck into it by the four corners—a quiet note of grief. Further on, I wandered into Staple Inn, and there stopped in surprise before a doorway over which was written, "P. J. T., 1747." This I recognised at once as the staircase leading to Mr. Grewgious' chambers. Just about the same hour that morning my friend Harry Dickens, as I afterwards learnt, was driving from Cannon-street to the office of All the Year Round, and when he paid his fare, the cabman noticing his mourning, asked if he was "any relative of the late deceased," and hearing that he was, said, "Ah, sir, we have all lost a friend."

The cabman was right. Dickens was essentially a friend of the people. He understood them, and, with all their failings and their eccentricities, he loved them. He could paint the courage and the patient sufferings of the poor far better than the conventionalities of polite society. Dickens always had the truest and most tender sympathy with the joys and the sorrows of simple folk. He could not have depicted for us a "verray parfit gentil knight" like Colonel Newcome. But, on the other hand, Thackeray could not have given us Mark Tapley or Dick Swiveller—still less Tiny Tim, Little Nell or Joe. His description of the "cold swarry" which Sam Weller attended at Bath, raised Dickens at once to the rank of a first-class humourist. But he was permanently enshrined in the hearts of the people by his Christmas Carol, in which he vehemently preached the doctrine that it was the duty of everyone to be radiantly happy on one day at least in the year.

Dickens was the only Londoner I ever saw who really loved London and was proud of being a Londoner. He was especially fond of the Inns of Court and the neighbourhood which surrounds them, and rightly so, for in his young days they were even more picturesque than they are now. It is true that he was not born in London. His father was a clerk in the Navy Pay Office, stationed at Portsmouth, and resided at Landport, where Dickens was born on February 7, 1812. But the family removed to London when Charles was very young, and lived first in Gower-street and then in Camden Town. He was a singularly observant child, with a keen sense of humour; and from his early boyhood he noted the peculiarities of the persons whom he met in all ranks of life, and used them later as material for his books. He was apparently allowed when a boy of seven or eight years old to study the works of Fielding, Smollett, and Mrs. Inchbald. When he was eleven years old he was sent to school in Mornington-place, in the Camden-road, and at the early age of fifteen he started in life as office boy to Mr. Blackmore, a solicitor in Gray's Inn-square. Here he learnt a little law and a great deal about the Marshalsea prison—knowledge which helped him to write "Pickwick," and, later, "Little Dorrit." In his evenings he studied shorthand, and so, after nearly three years' work in Gray's Inn-square, gained a position as reporter in Doctors'

Commons. His acquaintance with Doctors' Commons appears from "David Copperfield." At the age of nineteen he obtained a post in the Parliamentary gallery, where his father was already also a reporter; and he continued writing reports of political speeches for the True Sun, the Mirror of Parliament, and the Morning Chronicle till 1836.

His first original composition was entitled "A Dinner at Poplar"; it appeared in the Monthly Magazine for January, 1834. This formed the first of the series subsequently published in two volumes under the name of "Sketches by Boz." "Boz" was really the family name for one of his brothers, but Dickens adopted it as his nom de plume. The children had nicknamed their eldest brother Moses, and this was soon corrupted into Boses, and then into Boz.

The "Pickwick Papers," the first of which appeared in 1834, were also published by Dickens under the quaint name of Boz. They were published in parts—a method of publication which Miss Jenkyns considered "vulgar, and below the dignity of literature." But it had one great advantage. Everybody read each part at the same time, and, therefore, everybody talked about it—even in the quiet homes of Cranford. Tom Brown and Harry East read them in their study at Rugby though Flashman was roaring for a fag; Captain Brown—"poor dear infatuated man"—was reading the newest part when he gallantly met his death at Cranford Railway station. "Dombey and Son" was also published in parts, and the grief of the nation at the death of little Paul was thus quite as widespread and almost as genuine as its grief had been at the death of the Princess Charlotte; for Dickens was a mighty master of pathos.

In 1838 Dickens, who was then living at 48, Doughty-street, close to Gray's Inn, produced the "Memoirs of Grimaldi." This was, I believe, the last book which appeared under his nom de plume of Boz.

Who the dickens Boz could be Puzzled many a learned elf,
Till Time unsolved the mystery
And Boz appeared as Dickens' self.

These memoirs were originally written by Grimaldi himself; his friend, Mr. Wilks, subsequently expunged much that was neither amusing nor interesting to the public; then Dickens re-wrote large portions, improving the manner in which the facts were narrated "without any departure from the facts themselves." The value of the book was enhanced by several excellent and amusing pictures drawn by George Cruickshank, who had illustrated the later portion of the "Pickwick Papers," the earlier parts having been illustrated by Seymour. "Nicholas Nickleby" and many of Dickens' later works were illustrated by Phiz (Hablot K. Browne); "Our Mutual Friend," by Marcus Stone; and his last unfinished work, "Edwin Drood," by Luke Fildes.

Charles Dickens was admitted a student of the Middle Temple on December 6, 1839. He had at this date written "Oliver Twist" and "Nicholas Nickleby" in addition to "Sketches by Boz" and

"The Pickwick Papers." It is said that he joined the Middle Temple because he wished to follow the example of his great predecessor, Fielding, and to become a police magistrate; but this is by no means certain. He was never called to the Bar, nor did he ever occupy chambers in the Temple. Yet the Temple and its surroundings were very familiar to him, and strongly appealed to his imagination. He makes many references to them in his later writings: see, for instance, the description in "Barnaby Rudge" of Sir John Chester in his chambers in Paper Buildings, and of Eugene Wrayburn's chambers there, in "Our Mutual Friend." The fountain in the Middle Temple is always associated with the name of Ruth Pinch, in the mind of everyone who has read "Martin Chuzzlewit."

In 1842 Dickens went to the United States, where he was most cordially welcomed, and on his return he wrote the "American Notes." In the following year appeared "Martin Chuzzlewit," a large portion of which is drawn from his experiences in America. He regularly attended services at Little Portland-street Chapel when Mr. Taggart was minister there, and he was probably familiar with some of the works of the Rev. James Martineau. Indeed, it has been said that Dickens parodied the style of Dr. Martineau in the famous speech addressed by one of the Literary Ladies to Martin Chuzzlewit on his return from Eden: "Mind and matter glide swift into the vortex of immensity. Howls the sublime, and softly sleeps the calm Ideal in the whispering chambers of Imagination. To hear it, sweet it is. But then, outlaughs the stern philosopher and saith to the Grotesque: 'What ho, arrest for me that agency; go, bring it here!' And so the vision fadeth." But this, again, is by no means certain.

Everything that Dickens wrote was morally sound. No harm can follow from the study of his books, and, indeed, much good has followed from the perusal of them. The revelations contained in "Oliver Twist" directly contributed to reforms in the management of our work-houses; his description of the Marshalsea accelerated the abolition of imprisonment for debt. In "Nicholas Nickleby" he exposed the abuses then existing in Yorkshire schools, with the result that he was threatened with three actions of libel. The Circumlocution Office is still with us, in spite of the satire which Dickens levelled at it in "Little Dorrit"; but its absurdities are somewhat abated. Even his satire was always kindly. And, oh, the humour of the man! It is as rich and genuine in his later works as in his earlier, though there is less of it, and the fun is not quite so rollicking. And, in the midst of this humour, there is always a serious moral purpose in what he writes.

Yet our young people say that they cannot read Dickens; they have no time; his books are too long, his plots too intricate, and the number of his minor characters bewildering. It is true, no doubt, that his story does not gallop on at the pace familiar to readers of Rider Haggard and Stanley Weyman. It is true, too, that from his boyhood Dickens' powers of observation and memory had accumulated an abundance of material out of which his ever active imagination constructed a great variety of incidents and an amazing number of extraordinary characters. Very possibly these characters were not so extraordinary when he first depicted them as they seem to us now. The facilities of intercourse afforded by the railway, the bicycle, and the motor car, and the scattering of Londoners all over the country, have effaced many of the picturesque eccentricities of the old local life. Moreover, it is the fact that the plots of some of Dickens' novels are involved, and in others the climax is surprising, not to say far fetched. Thus, every circumstance narrated in "Bleak House" seems to point to the conclusion that it was Lady Dedlock who murdered Mr. Tulkynghorne, but suddenly we are told without any warning that the crime was for no sufficient reason committed by her French maid. Again, it is almost impossible to believe that simple Mr. Boffin could have acted the part of a miser so well as to deceive the sharp-eyed young lady who was then staying in his house. And in this novel, "Our Mutual Friend," we have two distinct main plots—the respective love affairs of Bella and Rokesmith and of Lizzie and Eugene; while all around these characters circle Mr. and Mrs. Veneering and their semi-detached friends, who act as the chorus in a Greek tragedy and criticise the conduct of the principal actors. Dickens' best plot is, undoubtedly, that of "The Tale of Two Cities"; and what a grand story it is! Sidney Carton's pure love for Lucie Manette converts him from a drunken, dissolute dog into a true hero, who was willing to lay down his life for her sake. This is, I think, the noblest of all Dickens' works; though I must accord a very high rank to "David Copperfield," in which the author gives us so beautiful and homely a picture of quiet English life, founded largely upon the incidents of his own early days.

Dickens is very dear to us old folk who read his tales as they came out, and we trust that many of our young folk, too, will join heartily in the commemoration of his birthday which all English-speaking nations will celebrate next week.

BERGSON ON LAUGHTER.

SIR,—Towards the close of his most able and entertaining article in your last issue, Professor Jacks most truly says: "M. Bergson's treatise throws light on many things besides laughter—on the theory of knowledge, on ethics, and, perhaps, on religion." I have lately been studying M. Bergson's work on "Time and Free Will," in which he endeavours (it seems to me quite unsuccessfully) to prove that whoever thinks that, in the moral crises of his life, it is possible for him to make any other choice than that which he actually makes, does so because he is the victim of spatial and mechanical conceptions. As I was reading the book it occurred to me that it was, perhaps, fortunate that in my student days Bergson had not appeared; for had one or two of us at college become enthusiastic Bergsonians we might have been tempted to smile, if not to laugh, as we saw our teacher, in the midst of his grand appeal to our moral consciousness, struggling helplessly and comically in the meshes of delusive spatial metaphors; for we should have remembered that, according to M. Bergson all who make such appeals in favour of Libertarianism are unconsciously misled, and utterly deluded by false spatial and mechanical ideas. But if, after the lecture, one of us had endeavoured to make clear to our professor M. Bergson's novel doctrine, I can well imagine Martineau indignantly exclaiming: "Have I ever in my lectures on Free Will given the slightest indication that I was in the faintest degree influenced by these spatial conceptions which you say have deluded me? My own firm conviction is that no such mechanical ideas ever enter into and affect any man's conviction; that in moments of temptation it is open to him to freely choose between what he feels to be the right and what he feels to be the wrong course of action; and I believe that the whole story of these mechanical conceptions is a fictitious creation by Bergson in order to harmonise ethics with his fundamental doctrine that reality is ever-flowing duration."

Certainly such "moral stalwarts" as Martineau, Channing, and the Newmans would have been "wooden" enough to feel assured that the brilliant and clever Frenchman's views were destructive of much which they regarded as most precious both in Ethics and in Religion. But it may be asked: "Why appeal to these antiquated authorities? What we have to do with is the living thought of the dwellers in the new mental world of the twentieth century." Well, if you turn to the last July number of our foremost philosophical journal, Mind, and look through a powerful article on "The Meaning of Human Freedom," you will find the writer, Mr. G. C. Field, saying: "Our self-knowledge tells us that the way in which our action is connected with its antecedent conditions is different in kind from what we call necessary connection. And its unique quality is what we mean by freedom. Thus, when we are faced with two alternatives we say with confidence that we 'can' take either of them. And if we are asked in what sense we 'can,' we reply that it is in the only true and original sense which it is possible for the word to bear. This sense is really familiar to all of us, but we cannot describe it further." (P. 390.)

It is, of-course, possible that Mr. Jacks may be right when he says: "In this world of flowing life, whatever stiffens itself is doomed, sooner or later, to be broken." Martineau and F. W. Newman were, no doubt, uncommonly stiff on the question of libertarianism; and the latter felt assured that, if you once gave up your hold on free-will, your faith in a God with whom you can hold spiritual communion, and also your belief in personal immortality, would also ere long desert you.

As I believe that this firm faith in man's power of free choice between alternatives is in no way connected with mechanical ideas, so I have no fear that it will ever be permanently broken. But my main object in writing this letter is to protest against some of the statements in Professor Jacks' last paragraph; and to assure him that it is quite possible to take the most serious exception to M. Bergson's ethical views, and at the same time to be neither "wooden" nor within the category of "Scribes and Pharisees." In a recent article in THE INQUIRER on "Religious Experience To-day," Mr. Whitaker well says: "When you come to the modern conscience you are in the very throes, in the actual pit of the contest that is deciding for the world its future religion." So it seems to me; and I believe that our highly-gifted Bergsonian professor is destined to take an important and helpful part in this momentous discussion, on which both ethics and religion depend; but to take this part most effectually it is necessary that he should not underrate those who are on the other side in the great controversy.—Yours, &c.,

RELIGION AND PERSONALITY.

SIR,—No man, outside a desert island, can deny, or if he be sane can desire to deny, the power and influence of human personality. We are all persons: God is personal, or so much more than personal. Nor will any observer of our human world be disposed to contradict the statement that most people dearly love a hero, and are strongly moved by the sense of the heroic. The influence of personality is as potent among persons as the twelve loaves and the few small fishes were in the feeding of the 5,000. Hero worship of the Carlyle or any other order has been instructive; but it has its dangers. The writer of the leading article on "The Secret of Personality," in your last issue, is a pertinent example. He not only (1) rebuts his own most positive assertion concerning personality, but (2) is guiltless of logical consequence. In the first place, we are reminded of "the appeal to sentiments and loyalties which are among the deepest and most sacred we know, the impassioned love of country and the dedicated service of the common good." I venture to assert that "the love of country," and certainly "the dedicated service of the common good," stand possessed of a more intense loyalty and devotion than can ever be evoked by a person. The cry of "The King" or "The Throne" always betokens a passion for the abstract sentiment rather than for any present occupant of the throne. William James has brought this out with his unequalled powers of elucidation. And further, I submit that "spiritual principles and moral precepts," however low their level be on the "philosophic" plane, also extend their far-reaching influence immeasurably farther than devotion to any one person can possibly do. It is even disputable whether it was "country" or "Garibaldi" that exerted the more subtle influence upon the young Milanese noble. The suggestion can further be made that "Love" is greater than its personification in any one person: just as "the Party" in politics wields an authority that no one leader ever pretended to wield. "Tariff Reform" looms larger than Mr. Bonar Law.

If I seem to labour this point as against the writer, I trust he will forgive me, when I tell him I am speaking my own deepest conviction. Thus, if I have a right as a person to my own instincts and sentiments, the influence of "spiritual principles" as put in the scale against any personal exponent of these principles is triumphantly assured. And, intuitively, I believe this to be true of Jesus of Nazareth. For what person existed who could legitimately claim his "personal devotion" in the sense of "The Secret of Personality"? Though, indeed, his unswerving allegiance to his principles and his God constituted him the friend of the poor and needy.

And before venturing ahead, let us say secondly that because Garibaldi and Ruskin were two great personalities—and here the abstract word "personality" is more suggestive than "person"—it is not in the way of logic to declare that, therefore (the leader-writer does not use the phrase), "the Religion of a Person" is unquestionably indispensable. Nor is it permissible to deny of other men, what is declared of Garibaldi and Ruskin, that these others also may be moved by "the attraction of joy, of fervour, and of life."

The upshot so far is that one person at least is moved more by principle than by persons: and for the simple reason that the ideal is more attractive than any limited personification of it.

We may now enter upon some of the implications of the Religion of a Person.

Mr. Emmet in his appeal for "Liberty of Criticism in the Church of England" in the October number of the Nineteenth Century, stated that "Christianity is the Religion of a Person." In his case the phrase intimates a loosening of certain bonds: and he believes in a passionate devotion to a Person; but that Person is a God. What more natural devotion? It is that of religious men in general. But what if the Person be not ranked as God? There lies the immense difficulty. And those devout believers who speak of "God in Christ" as the only belief for Christians are in similar case. The only tenable assumption is that the one way of communion with God is through his historical manifestation in Jesus Christ, that the revelation of God in Jesus (one cannot attribute to these the notion that this is the only revelation) is not only unique, but whole and perfect. What is likely to happen if by any chance the reverent scepticism of certain religious men relative to the very historicity of Jesus were confirmed? What in our recollection was the answer of Dr. James Drummond, whose own fervour awakes in devotion to a Person, when asked his opinion as to the possible effect upon Religion? The reply was that Theodore Parker and the left wing assert their religion would not be affected one whit, if it were proved Jesus never lived. That is to say, the left wing was made to answer for the centre and right wings of religious believers, which had no answer, and could not possibly have an answer, ready. One must submit again, and in all gravity, the immensity of the assumptions underlying this religion of a Person. There must be a perfect revelation of God in humanity: this human being must rightly claim the exercise of spiritual supremacy over the world—at least of Christians. In the words of an orthodox writer, "Ought any being to have the religious value of God to us, who is not personally and essentially God?" My own answer, with his, emphatically is No!

If the manifestation of "God in Christ" is less than has been assumed, then the theory of this "sole, perfect" access of God to man must be abandoned, and the "Religion of a Person" rejected as a narrowing, sectarian cry, confounded in fact, injurious in principle, and dishonouring to all the other prophets of God of all ages and climes. And with the disallowance of this "Godmanhood" must likewise depart the proud and exclusive claim of Christianity as a "final religion."

There can be no further need of amplification if my reasoning is sound. Questions of criticism, questions of the originality of Jesus, questions of the place of Jesus as a religious revealer, questions of his superiority in all points over his followers, questions of the relative merits of the New Testament to the newly discovered literature of the day, e.g., "The Odes of Solomon," questions of the value or defects of other religions, need not detain us. But the sad fact remains, that religious men calling themselves by the name of Liberal Christians constitute Jesus as the champion and the cause of religious aloofness.

I confess myself an ardent believer in "The Secret of Personality," but it is as an advocate of the influence of all personalities, and not in an exclusive and, however noble, "unique" person. And do we ever endeavour to catch the attitude of Jesus himself in this respect? "None is good, save One, God." Here is no trace of oligarchic, aristocratic superiority in this arresting human assertion, but rather the avowed proclamation of a spiritual democracy from which the very publican is not excluded. There are orders of personality, and the kingdom of God calls for each and all.—Yours, &c.,

ASSYRIAN AND BABYLONIAN RELIGION.

Religious Belief in Babylonia and Assyria. M. Jastrow, jun., Ph.D. New York and London: Putnam. 9s. net.

THIS is the latest volume of the American Lectures on the History of Religions, a series having much the same object as the old Hibbert Lectures of twenty to thirty years ago. There is need of a fresh treatment of some of the subjects formerly dealt with, owing to the amount of new material brought to light in the interval; and nowhere, perhaps, is this more true than in the case of Assyrian and Babylonian religion. The work of deciphering and interpreting the cuneiform texts has been carried far beyond the point reached when Sayce gave his Hibbert Lectures in 1887; and the knowledge thus gained upon particular points goes to form a general conception of the whole more consistent and reliable than was then possible. Dr. Jastrow has produced an admirable book, so far as one can judge who, in regard to Assyriology, is merely the man in the street. I am in no way competent to criticise his statements; but, after all, it is the man in the street who needs some expert to tell him what is being done in the expert's own field of study, what conclusions have been reached, what main facts have been established. I approached Dr. Jastrow's book with the recollection of having read, or tried to read, Jeremiah's recent work on "The Old Testament in the light of the Ancient East"; and I expected to find myself again overwhelmed by a mass of bewildering names, and an astronomical theory almost incredible. But I soon found that Dr. Jastrow, with no less learning, presented his subject in a very different manner; and I read his book through with deep interest, and the sense of really being helped to understand the subject. Of course, the fact that the contents of the book were delivered as lectures (though not exactly popular lectures) accounts to some extent for its clearness and readableness. Jeremiah's book seemed to be rather a collection of notes by an expert for experts, too technical for the ordinary reader. If anyone has, as I have, wondered what to make of Jeremiah's book, and where he was at the end of it, he will find in Jastrow a most welcome friend and teacher. I was very much struck with the absence of extravagance in the theories advanced, the clearness and self-control of a man who does not lose sight of his subject as a whole by burying himself in a heap of details. I was also struck by the fact that Jeremiah's portentous astronomical theory is hardly mentioned, and is allowed no such dominating position as had been claimed for it. The chronology, too, in Dr. Jastrow's hands, is more modest in its range; and the reader is not invited to rely upon dates previous to 3,000 B.C.

The lectures are only six in number; but, as printed, they must contain far more than what was spoken, unless the American capacity for listening be almost inexhaustible. The subjects are:—(1) Culture and Religion, (2) The Pantheon (3) Divination, (4) Astrology, (5) The Temples and the Cults, (6) Ethics and Life after Death. It would be easy to name points of interest in every chapter; but to do so would be almost to summarise the whole book. I would rather commend it to the general reader; and will add, for his encouragement, that its style is pleasant and free from American turns of expression which sometimes jar upon the English ear. Those who wish to learn some more about one of the oldest known forms of religion, and what it meant to its adherents, cannot do better than read Dr. Jastrow's admirable book.

THE GERMAN LYRIC.

The Oxford Book of German Verse. At the Clarendon Press. 6s. net.

THERE are no more delightful anthologies either in form or contents than the "Oxford Books of Verse." We offer a hearty and grateful welcome to the new volume which has come to keep company with its predecessors in the international friendship of good poetry. To some readers, who first entered the paradise of German lyrical poetry through the gateway of Buchheim's "Deutsche Lyrik," it will perhaps be something of a shock to hear that the Golden Treasury volume is in danger of being superseded; but the spirit of poetry is ever at work, and there was no "finis" to the matchless charm of the German lyric when Heine was consigned to his grave at Montmartre or Goethe found a more honoured resting-place in Weimar. Our old favourite and our new friend have much in common; but the book which Professor H. G. Fiedler has edited for the Clarendon Press contains selections from the work of Liliencron, and Gerhart Hauptmann and Richard Dehmel and other modern poets, which will be as welcome as they are unfamiliar. It has also its own special note of distinction in a German introduction from the pen of Gerhart Hauptmann himself.

CITIZENSHIP AND RELIGION.

The Nation in Judgment. By A. L. Lilley. London: Francis Griffiths. 3s. 6d. net.

THIS collection of sermons on some national questions and occasions has the individuality, the fine mental balance, and the spiritual suggestiveness of all Mr. Lilley's work. Those who read it will realise afresh the serious loss which his recent appointment to a canonry in Hereford Cathedral involves to the forces of breadth and idealism in the religious life of London. The "special" sermon is one of the surest tests of a preacher's power. If the occasion arises out of some striking national event or has a close connection with burning questions of public policy or social reform, it is fatally easy to take refuge in the language of complacent moralising or to lapse into the rhetoric of the partisan. No sermon of the kind can be said to be successful unless it helps to purge the soul of all base passion in face of the great duties of life and illumines it with a fresh vision of the loveliness of the Divine Kingdom. "To make our citizenship religious," Mr. Lilley reminds us, "we must meditate much upon the nature of its duties and the means of accomplishing them. It will not do to shout with the party of reform any more than to shout against it. We must bring something to it, something original and individual, gained in long pondering over the difficulties to be overcome. I know of no duty which is more sternly forced upon the Christian of to-day than that of study and experiment in the matter of the human problems he has to face. That is the new sphere of Christian meditation. For the Christian meditation has always meant the discussion of his difficulties with God, the retirement, if it be possible, into those hidden depths of a man's self where the disturbance of superficial passions and prejudices is no longer felt, where God dwells and speaks to him in the silence. And there we have got to discuss these things and find the orientation of our duty. And again: "Religion does not solve things automatically, as if it were a compact and abstract theory. It fills men with the power of solving them, because it is life and the true spirit of life." These words illustrate far better than any descriptive or critical remarks of our own could do the spirit and temper in which Mr. Lilley deals with the difficult issues of national and social life, and the quality of the religious help and guidance which the reader will find in these pages. Among the subjects treated are "The Uses of National Emotion," "The Responsibilities of National Power," "Citizenship and Justice," "The Spiritual Sources of Social Unrest," and "The Unity of Christendom."

LITERARY NOTES.

WE regret to learn that Mr. James Allen, editor of the Epoch, has just died at Ilfracombe. Of his books perhaps "Above Life's Turmoil," "The Master of Destiny," and "As a Man Thinketh," are the best known and have had the largest circulation. His philosophy of life was based upon the teaching which has been made familiar to English people in "The Light of Asia," and he was never weary of trying to make his readers perceive the beauty of "the infinite and eternal law of causation" of which Emerson was thinking when he said: "Justice is not postponed; a perfect equity adjusts the balance in all parts of life." We understand that Mrs. Allen, who has helped her husband in editing the Epoch, will carry on his work.

AMONG their spring publications Messrs. Macmillan announce the first series of Mrs. Bosanquet's "Social Conditions in Provincial Towns."

* * *

"THE Beginnings of Quakerism," by William Braithwaite, which has just been issued by Messrs. Macmillan, is a companion volume to the recently published book on "The Quakers in the American Colonies," by Professor Rufus M. Jones, who also writes an introduction to the present work. It forms one of a series designed to give a full history of the Quaker movement in England and the Colonies, and it treats of Quakerism from its earliest sources in the reign of Elizabeth, carrying on the story to the year of the Restoration.

THE new volume by R. L. Stevenson announced by Messrs. Chatto & Windus, "Records of a Family of Engineers," contains material which has not hitherto been printed in book form, except in the "Edinburgh" and "Pentland" editions of Stevenson's works. It deals with the early history of the Stevensons in Scotland, and contains a biography of Robert Stevenson, the constructor of the Bell Rock and many other lighthouses. The extracts given from his grandfather's diary are of special importance as bearing upon the origin of Stevenson's literary gift.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER.

(1340-1400.)

"For Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through Thy works, and I will rejoice in giving praise for the operations of Thy hands.—PSALM xcii.

I.

TO-DAY we will talk of another poet, but a very different kind of poet from Cædmon. You know Cædmon was a poor man, who lived a lonely life far away from towns and courts.

Chaucer was a man who had travelled about a good deal, and had seen other countries besides his own; he had also lived with princes and nobles, and had heard them talk of all that was going on in the world, and as he could read very well he was always studying, and knew all that was to be known from the books people had then—far fewer than we have, of course, but perhaps folks were none the worse for that, for the books they had were few and good. Chaucer's father lived in London, and so he was brought up there. We don't know whether he went to school or college, but in whatever way he got his learning he must have worked hard at his books, for his poetry shows us that he knew a great deal about many things,—Classics, that is to say all the old stories written in Greek and Latin about the Greeks and Romans, and their gods and goddesses; divinity, that is to say all the Bible history and what good and religious men have said and thought about it; philosophy, which means all that the wisest people have written about life and death, and what we ought to do in the world to spend our short life as well as we can; astronomy, which means knowing how the stars move, how large they are compared to each other, and the distances they are apart; chemistry, that is, knowing what things are made of; and many sciences besides. (A science is anything which people know, arranged in a way in which it may be learnt.) And he knew French and Latin as well as English, for gentlefolks then used these languages more than English—French for speaking and writing, and Latin for writing.

So, you see, Chaucer must have worked very hard at his books to get so much into his head by the time he was grown up and began to write his poetry. But all through his life he never left off reading and studying, except when he was a soldier, and when he travelled to Italy and France as the King's envoy. Often when he was among many people all talking and laughing, he would not say a word, for he was thinking of his books at home and of what he should write next, and in one of his poems he tells how they would joke him, and say, "Thou lookest as thou wouldest find a hare, and ever on the ground I see thee stare." But though he may not have talked much, he knew how to use his eyes, as we shall see from his poetry.

If you could see Chaucer sitting in his house, writing poetry, how funny you would think it! Everything was so different then to what it is now. I'll begin with the house. First of all, there were no carpets on the floors, nothing but rushes which people strewed over the boards or stone to make it warmer for their feet. Then very few people could afford to have glass windows. I think a kind of thick stuff like horn was used, which let through the light, but which you could not see through; or else the windows had nothing but wooden shutters to close at night. There were no sofas or armchairs, nothing but straight benches to set against the wall. There was no paper on the walls, and no pictures, but sometimes there would be curtains like large pictures made of needlework and called tapestry. Now suppose Chaucer were hungry and wanted his dinner, he would not go to sit at a table as you do; the table would be brought to him. Two trestles and a board were carried in, and on this board were put all the things that people ate then, and it was different from our food. There was no such thing as tea or coffee; everyone had beer or wine and meat, for breakfast and dinner and supper all alike. There were no knives and forks, so people ate with their fingers, and if you wanted to be polite you had to take care to have very clean hands and nails. And there were no plates, so instead of them people used flat cakes of bread, and after the meat had been eaten off them, they were often given to the poor, because they were soaked with gravy. When the meal was finished, servants came and carried away the table.

You would think Chaucer's clothes very funny, too, but they were much prettier than what people wear now. Then, everyone, men and women alike, dressed in bright colours—green, and red, and blue; and it must have looked much nicer to see them walking about in the streets than it does to see people in dingy coats and trousers. In his pictures Chaucer usually wears a grey tunic, with bright red stockings and a dark hood, with a long tail hanging down behind which was twisted round his head when he went out, to keep the hood on. When he was going to Court and wanted to be grander than usual, he would wear a tunic of some brighter colour, a shining belt and buckle, a dagger, and perhaps a piece of gold round his hair. When he was 16, he was sent to be page in the household of the Duke of Lancaster. A page did not then mean a little boy in buttons who cleans the boots and knives. It was like a sort of "finishing school" for gentlemen's sons; living with these great ladies and gentlemen taught them to behave nicely, to sing and play (if they had any cleverness for it), to know what was going on in the world; and if there were any wars at the time, and the master of the house went to fight, he would take the pages with him, so that they would learn how to carry arms and to be brave in battle. After this, Chaucer is supposed to have been a lawyer, and he is said to have been fined two shillings (that would be about sixteen shillings nowadays) for beating a Franciscan friar in Fleet-street. Chaucer did not like the friars; he thought that many of them were hypocrites—that is to say, they did not always act up to what they said, which is a bad thing. In 1339 he became a soldier, and in one of the wars with France he was taken prisoner, and kept there for a year. When he came back he married a lady called Philippa, who came from France. Perhaps you would like to know what she looked like. Well, she would have a curious head-dress, and a very long gown, perhaps of green, with fur round the edge, and a splendid belt of jewels, and shoes with long points—they were made like that in order that ladies should not trip over their long skirts. When she went out or crossed the street, she would wear tall clogs, to keep her pretty shoes out of the mud. She was a great friend of Queen Philippa (do you remember how Queen Philippa begged the lives of the twelve citizens of Calais from King Edward III.?). Through her, and also because he was a friend of John of Gaunt, King Edward's son, Chaucer came to be a great deal at Court, and so he lived most of his life in London; but I must tell you more about that in another article.

THE SPIRIT OF NATIONALITY.

A New International League.

For some time a movement has been in progress which may be of far-reaching benefit to the smaller nationalities, whose rights and liberties are often placed in jeopardy by the encroachments or the autocratic methods of their more powerful neighbours. It is no secret that the movement owes its inception to the international conferences which have been held at Pontigny under the large-hearted guidance of M. Paul Desjardins. A preliminary appeal has just been issued in French, German and English as the first step towards the foundation of an International League. It is in the following terms:—

APPEAL.

We propose to form an Association composed of private individuals of different nations with the object of organising international opinion in order to give moral support to those peoples who are struggling against infringements of their rights. We ask you to join us in this effort.

(1) Even in Europe there are many peoples thus oppressed. Some are suffering from special legal disabilities, others from the violation of guarantees given by formal undertakings. In other cases there is a systematic attempt to exterminate a language or a national form of civilisation, while in others the fundamental right that no people shall be incorporated in a state without its free consent is ignored and set aside.

(2) We feel that their injuries are ours. It is our intention that the questions raised by their abnormal position shall neither be evaded nor burked, that they shall continue to be pressed on the public attention until they are solved in conformity with justice.

(3) We are well aware that the principles on which we base our demand are of comparatively modern origin. That which was generally accepted in Europe four generations ago as right and lawful, we hold to be unacceptable to-day. We take our stand upon the traditions of the French and American Revolutions, and in our eyes the Declarations of Rights enunciated at that time by freely elected Assemblies are monuments of popular rights common to all civilised peoples. It is possible to go beyond them, but they must be taken as a starting point. Arbitrary methods, the confusion of the executive and legislative powers absorbed in the hands of the police, the supposed right of conquest, in fact the whole system of the "raison d'Etat" by which the possession of man by man is supposed to be justified, all this is, in our opinion, an anachronism which stands condemned.

It is our wish that the greatest possible number of our contemporaries should pass from the condition of subjects to the dignity of citizens.

(4) We know how stubborn and painful has been the conflict which has rendered possible and brought into being these new demands of the public conscience. Men of all the nations of Europe and of the civilised world have contributed to this conquest. It is their common possession. They ought to unite in order to safeguard, to preserve and to extend it. To make clear and familiar this modern idea of right, to defend and to develop it by following it to its logical conclusions, to make it in fact a living principle is the main object of the International Association which we intend to form.

(5) The Association will be composed of private individuals, whose adhesion commits nobody but themselves and whose action is quite independent of their respective Governments.

Our Association does not mask any ulterior design either deliberately hostile or deliberately favourable to any nation whatsoever. While neither reproving sentiments of national self-respect nor ignoring the necessity of admitting in times of peril the passionate expression of national sentiment, our Association will not regard the questions at issue from the standpoint of merely national interests. It will hold up to public reprobation every violation of right brought to its notice, in whatever country it may have been committed and whatever interests it may serve. We know how men's heads are turned by power and how easily a change of circumstances may convert the oppressed into oppressors.

We count, therefore, on the sympathy and co-operation of thoughtful men in all countries. If their patriotism is reasonable and generous it cannot make them distrustful of our efforts.

(6) We shall, then, attempt to organise the public opinion of the civilised nations, and it is by that means that we hope to take effective action. Public opinion, as the most cursory observation of facts proves, is not a force to be despised. In the times of the Tudors rulers might ignore it or set it at defiance, but the Governments of to-day, by the care that they take to mislead it, prove that they realise its force. They begin to see that the reprobation of some thousands of disinterested witnesses strikes a blow at their credit and impairs their strength.

(7) The history of recent years has shown that public opinion can be aroused by some glaring iniquity, which may lead to the formation of sundry leagues, the presenting of petitions, campaigns in the press and public demonstrations. But such manifestations of public feeling, being provoked by apparently isolated events, are only of a temporary character, and the claims of a right that has been violated are too often mixed up with political passion or prejudice which weaken the force of the protest. On the other hand, these intermittent outbursts squander and exhaust, for a time at least, the force of the reaction against such acts of injustice, which should always be on the alert and be ready at all times to manifest itself. The force which sets it in motion should be continually prepared for action.

(8) Public opinion, then, should be so organised that its manifestations may gain in weight and its reserves of strength, still feeble and hesitating, may be better regulated. Our Association is an attempt in this direction.

There is nothing utopian about such a project provided that it is clearly realised that our task involves a prolonged and patient effort of education. We should take courage, too, from the thought that our effort tends in the direction towards which modern society is visibly moving. So much so, that in a sense our Association is already in existence, and all that is necessary is to put it into concrete form.

(9) It would seem that our first means of action should be an international organ for the supply of regular information under the exclusive control of the Association.

Its information will bear on all acts of Governments that are contrary to popular rights, such as we declare them to be. We shall deal primarily with questions which affect the civilised peoples, but even beyond their limits no appeal to the public conscience will be excluded as being outside the scope of our Association.

Information will be obtained in the different countries by correspondents capable of sifting the evidence. It will always be precise, objective, and capable of verification.

The information will be collected under general headings so as to demonstrate the ubiquity of despotic methods and the ubiquity of the demand for equal rights.

(10) Although we are not compatriots, we regard ourselves in a certain sense as fellow-citizens. This common title binds us together; we feel that it confers a dignity upon us, and that, if need be, it calls for sacrifices on our part. We consider that it commands us to-day to found this Association.

If you consent, or rather, if you feel yourself obliged to co-operate with us, we invite you to join us in our deliberations as to the best means of putting our plan into execution.

This appeal has been signed among others by:—

Professor Baldensperger, of Giessen; Dr. Hermann Beck, of Berlin; Mr. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, Dr. George Brandes, M. Ferdinand Buisson, Mr. Robert Dell, Mr. Paul Discours, M. Paul Desjardins, Mr. N. F. Dryhurst, M. Anatole France, Professor Charles Gide, of Paris; Mr. R. B. Cunningham-Graham, Miss Emily Hobhouse, Mr. L. T. Hobhouse, M. Paul Hyacinthe Loyson, Mr. C. E. Maurice, M. Gabriel Monod, Mr. H. W. Nevins, M. Frédéric Passy, Professor Reuter, of Helsingfors; M. Emile Vandervelde, M. Emile Verhaeren, and Madame Emile Zola.

The general secretary of the "Droit des Peuples" is Mr. Austin Meade, 1, Place Saint-François-Xavier, Paris. Those who are interested in its objects in England should write to Mr. Dryhurst, 40, Outer Temple, London, E.C. "Les Droits des Hommes," the weekly journal edited by M. Paul Hyacinthe Loyson, will be the organ of the League, and information will be supplied regularly through its columns.

THE BUNYAN MEMORIAL.

JOHN BUNYAN had a considerable sense of humour, as discerning readers of "The Pilgrim's Progress" will be well aware, and one can imagine that he would have had it more than usually aroused had he been able to foresee the evolution of his fame. That his biography would be written in the nineteenth century by an Oxford professor would probably have seemed incredible to him, although maybe any joy he would have had in the prospect would have been chastened had he known that his biographer would be an Agnostic (a "ranter," I suppose he would have said) who had already written a book entitled "The Nemesis of Faith." The height of his fame, however, was surely reached on Thursday, January 25, when a memorial window in Westminster Abbey, executed at a cost of £1,500, contributed by thousands of admirers of all kinds of creeds, some of whom he would probably have consigned to what, by a curious contradiction of terms, he would have called "the bottomless pit," was formally handed over to the Dean.

The fund was inaugurated as a result of the World's Baptist Congress in 1905, an American delegate not unnaturally remarking on the absence of any appropriate national memorial to the genius of the Bedford tinker. A committee, delightfully catholic, including men of such varied views as the late George Meredith, A. C. Benson, Frederic Harrison, Stopford Brooke, Dr. Clifford, Dr. Alexander Whyte, Dr. Fairbairn, Sir Oliver Lodge, John Morley, Edmund Gosse, and Canon Scott Holland was formed to carry out the project, and the result of their labours was seen at the very impressive service held at the Abbey.

The liturgy, customary at the afternoon service, was used, but a special prayer was introduced expressing thanks for "the singular gifts" bestowed on Bunyan, and the scripture readings were most appropriately chosen from a passage in the life of Jeremiah, and Paul's defence before Agrippa. The Dean preached an admirable sermon in tribute to Bunyan, taking as his text Hebrews xii. 22 to 24. After a very short epitome of Bunyan's life the preacher eulogised his style, quoting Macaulay's famous tribute and praising the way in which "the genius of his style served the genius of his imagination." The Dean quoted Bunyan's defence of himself, in the introduction to "The Holy War," against the charges of plagiarism, and confessed his own belief that those attempts had failed, his sources of inspiration being, he thought, nothing but his own long-drawn spiritual conflict, his assiduous study of the Bible, and his careful scrutiny of his fellow-men. The Dean gloried in the fact that Bunyan was a bond of unity, praised his great charity, and remarked that although he was imprisoned under a most intolerant Act, which he described "as a blot on the statute book of our country of which history is ashamed," he never expressed anger, and if Judge Hategood was a picture of Judge Jeffries he made no denunciations or tried to "make things more bitter in an age of bitterness." Referring to the generous appreciation of Bunyan which his predecessor, Stanley, had delivered, the preacher related two personal experiences. He recalled a little parsonage in Suffolk, and five children, himself among them, sitting round the fire, each with a copy of "The Pilgrim's Progress," reading with interest and discussing the incidents. Some years later, he said, he participated, as Bishop of Winchester, in a Bishops' Retreat at Lambeth Palace, for which the devotional book chosen for reading at meal times was the same volume. He particularly remembered the emotion with which the Bishops rose and read the closing scenes of Christiana's pilgrimage and the crossing of the bridgeless river. There was depicted, said the Dean, in Bunyan's book a wonderful variety of Christian character and diversity of Christian experience, and the author was "one of the most illustrious of English writers, and one of the most faithful servants of Jesus Christ."

At the conclusion of the sermon a procession was formed, consisting, in addition to the Dean, of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Clifford, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Dr. Monro Gibson, Professor Garvie, Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mr. Austin Dobson, and Mr. Edmund Gosse, and proceeded to the window which is situated in the north transept. In a few words, Dr. Clifford, as chairman of the committee, formally handed the window over to the care of the Dean, who more briefly accepted it.

The window depicts a number of scenes from "The Pilgrim's Progress," and includes a portrait of Bunyan asleep, after the familiar picture. It has been admirably executed by Mr. J. N. Comper, and through his skill and the offerings of numerous admirers, John Bunyan, 220 years late, receives some recognition of his great genius.

THE BRAHMO SAMAJ ANNIVERSARY.

THE 82nd anniversary of the Brahmo Samaj was celebrated by the members in London last week. It was on the 11th day of Magh (corresponding this year with January 25) in the year 1830 that the Church of the Brahmo Samaj was formally established in Calcutta by Raja Ram-mohun Roy. From the first it has represented a wide and Catholic faith, and it has expanded in spirituality and liberality of thought. On the anniversary day, January 25, divine service was conducted in the evening at Essex Hall, Strand, by Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter. Many members and friends of the Brahmo Samaj were present. In his address Dr. Carpenter urged the members of the Samaj, many of whom are students here, to realise the high ideals of the Samaj, to look on life as a trust from God, to take up actively the work of social and other reforms, and not to be satisfied with a religion of contemplation merely. He quoted the beautiful Sanskrit prayer, "Lead me from falsehood to truth, lead me from darkness to light, lead me from death to the deathless," which has been incorporated as a part of the Brahmo Samaj service.

He also read an extract from the autobiography of Maharshi Devendranath Tagore, one of the revered founders of the Samaj, and cited the lives of Keshab Chandra Sen, Pratap Chandra Majumdar, and Ananda Mohun Bose.

On Friday, January 26, the members of the Brahmo Samaj gave an "At Home" to their friends and sympathisers with the movement at the Waldorf Hotel. About 200 guests were present, and most of the Brahmos living in London attended and acted as hosts. It may be of interest to note that they wore a badge with the Bengali letters "Om," the well-known Vedic syllable meaning the Supreme Being. This has been adopted as a motto by the Brahmo Samaj, and it is said that Raja Rammohun Roy expired at Bristol in 1833 with this word on his lips.

In welcoming the guests, Sir K. G. Gupta alluded to the work of the Brahmo Samaj, and the great advantage India had received by coming in contact with the West. Mr. J. Harrison, a former President of the Unitarian Association, responded on behalf of the guests. The following Sunday, divine service in Bengali was conducted at the Emerson Club in the morning by Mr. S. C. Roy, the assistant secretary of the Samaj.

The members of the Samaj in London in thus celebrating their anniversary have felt very much the absence of Dr. P. K. Ray, who had been their minister and guiding spirit all along, but who had suddenly been called away to India. It had been his earnest wish, as it is the wish of other members of the Samaj, that the work and principles of the Brahmo Samaj may be more widely known in England, as they were a generation ago. It is a religion of harmony, and endeavours to assimilate the spirituality of the East with the social progressiveness of the West. The Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man are its cardinal principles; and, as such, it is at one with Unitarianism. It does not merely represent certain intellectual convictions, and, apart from its spiritual side, it has carried out social reforms of the highest importance to India. In fact, it may be regarded as the pioneer and the life-giving force of all such movements. It has abolished suttee, broken down arbitrary caste restrictions, greatly improved the position of women, removed infant marriage, polygamy, and a host of attendant evils. In short, it has tried to make life purer and brighter in India, and it has sought truth from whatever source this may come. It does not recognise the infallibility of any Scripture, or the exclusive leadership or divinity of any particular person. Its chief characteristics may be regarded as universality, spirituality, sociality, independence, immediacy, and catholicity.

The secretary of the Brahmo Samaj in London at present is Mr. S. C. Mukerjee (of the Indian Civil Service, on leave), 51, Cornwall-gardens, S.W.

MEMORIAL TO DR. EVERETT HALE.

A BEAUTIFUL bronze tablet in memory of Dr. Edward Everett Hale was placed in the South Congregational Church, Boston, U.S.A., at the close of the Old Year, by the Welcome and Correspondence Club, which used to meet Dr. Hale every Thursday morning. The duties of this Club were to welcome such strangers as might come for any reason to the study of a popular minister of a prosperous church, and also to attend to such correspondence and work as were placed by him in its hands. Mr. Edwin D. Mead, in giving the memorial address, explained that the members had asked for the co-operation of those whom Dr. Hale had baptised or married, or to whom he had ministered in times of sorrow, in preparing this welcome gift for the church, the walls and windows of which were already memorials of him whose message delivered so often from its pulpit through the years was, "In God we live and move and have our being." The words upon the tablet are as follows:—"In loving memory of Edward Everett Hale, Minister of the South Congregational Church, 1856-1909. 'That they might have life more abundantly.' " Mr. Mead said:—"I am glad that this particular text was chosen for the tablet, this motto which he himself chose for our church seal. I have read somewhere an impressive account of President Faunce's first address to the students of Brown University, when he came to the administration of that historic institution, in which Dr. Hale always took a peculiar interest, in the city of Providence which he loved so well. Dr. Faunce said, to the great gathering of students assembled to welcome him, that he had heard within a short period before, in two religious conventions, two striking addresses. One was by Phillips Brooks, the other was by Edward Everett Hale. Phillips Brooks, he said, was constantly emphasising in his address one word, the word 'life.' Dr. Hale was constantly emphasising in his address one word, the word 'together.' 'Now,' said Dr. Faunce to the students, 'let us here in the period now opening unite those words, and consecrate ourselves to a noble life together.' We all here remember well how constantly the word 'together' was upon Dr. Hale's tongue. Yet it is not that word, but the other, the word 'life' which this new memorial tablet of ours places at the front—"That they might have life more abundantly." You know what kind of life is meant. It is the divine life, the life of God in the soul of man. Our tablet has for us the same message which the windows have—the message of God in whom we live, who is to be worshipped in spirit and in truth, whose way it is our business to prepare, whose life in our own souls it is our highest privilege and duty to make ever more and more abundant.

"The evening of this day is New Year's Eve. That always was an occasion of peculiar significance and service to Dr. Hale. You know the place he so long made it fill in our church life. I think upon this last day of the year of the most significant of New Year's Eves in his own life. It was the new century's eve—the night in which we passed from the nineteenth century into the twentieth. You all remember that memorable night—the great gathering of twenty thousand people before the State House, the chorus on the balcony, the sound of the trumpets, the answering of the church bell, the solemn service led by Dr. Hale. He has himself left us the most picturesque and impressive story of it all. There was nothing in the service more impressive than his reading of the Ninetieth Psalm. In such full and powerful tones he read it that the words were plainly heard by the thousands on the Common and even in the streets beyond.

"Let the words of that Psalm be our thought, our prayer, our new consecration as a congregation, as we here dedicate this new memorial."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

A MEETING of the Committee was held in Manchester on January 25, at which there were present the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson (President), D. Agate, J. H. Bibby, B. C. Constable, Rudolf Davis, A. H. Dolphin, E. D. P. Evans, C. Hargrove, W. H. Lambelle, W. W. C. Pope, H. D. Roberts, C. Roper, C. J. Street, F. H. Vaughan, Joseph Wood, J. J. Wright, Sir J. W. Scott (treasurer), Messrs. H. P. Grey, C. Sydney Jones, W. B. Kenrick, Jno. Lawson, G. H. Leigh, T. F. Robinson, Grosvenor Talbot, A. S. Thew, G. W. R. Wood, and the secretary (Rev. Jas. Harwood). Apologies for absence were received from the Revs. A. Golland, H. Gow, A. Hall, J. A. Kelly, C. Peach, H. J. Rossington, T. P. Spedding, W. G. Tarrant, J. H. Weatherall, Sir W. B. Bowring, Miss Lee, Messrs. Harold Baily and Jno. Harrison.

Among other items of business the following were dealt with:—

A resolution of regret and sympathy on the death of the Rev. A. J. Marchant, a representative member of the Committee, was passed.

The resignation of the Treasurer on grounds of health and the pressure of engagements was received with much regret. Sir Jas. Scott was cordially thanked for his services during the last six years, and it was agreed to nominate Mr. John Harrison as his successor.

The Treasurer's statement was read.

Applications to be placed on the roll by the congregations at Finchley and Bolton-on-Deane (Free Congregational Church) and the Sheffield and District Association of Churches were agreed to, and it was further resolved to recommend the Conference to include the last named among the list of Societies in rule 7, entitled to send a representative to the Committee.

The report of the Joint Committee on Ministerial Stipends was received, and, with a minor modification, adopted as a recommendation to the Conference. The report of the Joint Committee on the Revision of the list of Ministers in the Essex Hall Year Book was received, and the re-considered report of the Sub-Committee on Rules was adopted with some amendments. The triennial report of the Committee was agreed to.

It was resolved that the several Advisory Committees be requested confidentially to notify the Secretary of the Conference not only of the ministers to whom they grant certificates, but also of those to whom they decline to grant them.

The programme of the Triennial Meetings and the general arrangements were approved.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The fourth annual general meeting of the Moral Education League will be held at the Royal Society of Arts, John-street, Adelphi, on Tuesday, February 13, at 8.15 p.m., Mr. G. P. Gooch, M.P., in the chair. Mrs. Sophie Bryant, D.Sc., Litt.D., will deliver the annual address, her subject being "The Many-sidedness of Moral Education."

THE Secretary of the Penal Reform League will be glad to send cards to any members and friends who wish to attend a Conference on "Juvenile Courts and Probation," which will be held, by kind permission of Lady Brassey, at 24, Park-lane, W., on Thursday, February 15, at 3.30 p.m. Earl Grey will preside, and Mr. Courtenay Lord will open the discussion. Sir John Gorst, Mr. G. A. Aitken, M.V.O., Mr. Cecil Chapman, Mr. C. E. B. Russell, and others are expected to be present.

MR. J. A. HOBSON, M.A., will deliver the Dunkin Lectures at Manchester College this term, his subject being "A Human Valuation of Modern Industry." Professor Sir Henry Jones, L.L.D., Hibbert Lecturer on Metaphysics, will give a special course during February and March on "Spiritual Realism."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Acton: Creffield-road Church.—On Tuesday, January 30, Dr. Tudor Jones gave an interesting lecture on New Zealand to the members and friends of the Creffield-road Church. The lecture was illustrated by a series of lantern views. Mr. J. A. Baines presided.

Ballyhemlin.—On Tuesday, January 30, a successful concert and entertainment was held in connection with the meeting-house. The Rev. John Barron presided. The proceeds were on behalf of the general fund of the church, and amounted to about £11.

Birmingham: Waverley-road.—The annual meeting of the congregation of Waverley-road Church was held on Saturday, January 27, Mr. W. H. Nightingale presiding. The first year's ministry of the Rev. Gertrude von Petzold has just been completed, and it has been eminently successful in every way, although there have been certain difficulties to contend with. One very encouraging feature of the report is that it records the addition of 64 new subscribers to the church. The financial statement presented by the treasurer was also highly satisfactory, showing a substantial balance in hand. The collections have been more than doubled, and amount to £140. The lack of room and accommodation make it impossible, unfortunately, for the Sunday school to take any more children. The teachers have to work under very trying conditions, and at least four classes are held in the church each Sunday.

Liverpool: Ullet-road Church.—As a result of the renewed interest in Cardinal Newman which has been awakened by the publication of his biography by Mr. Wilfrid Ward, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers will deal with the great questions which divide Free Churchmen from the Roman Catholic Church on the first three Sunday mornings in February. The first address of the series, on the "Life and Character of Newman," was delivered on January 28.

Maidstone: Death of Mr. William Haynes, J.P.—On Saturday, January 20, the death took place of Mr. William Haynes, J.P. (known to many as Major Haynes) as the result of heart failure, at the age of 76. Mr. Haynes was the chairman of one of the largest firms of ironmongers in the South of England, and had rendered many valuable services to his native town of Maidstone in various public capacities. He first entered the corporation as far back as 1865, when he was elected for the King-street Ward, his father at that time being an Alderman of the Council. Subsequently he filled the office of Mayor on three occasions. He was always interested in the Volunteer movement, and after serving for several years in a local regiment he received his commission, and quickly made a name for himself as a company officer. He was a staunch Liberal, and spoke effectively on the public platform both on political and educational subjects. Mr. Haynes was also chairman of the Governors of the Girls' Grammar School, and the senior magistrate in Maidstone. In these and other ways he rendered valuable service to the public, and in June of last year he received the honorary freedom of the borough. The funeral took place on Friday, January 26, and was attended by the Mayor and Corporation and the borough magistrates, together with representatives of many other public bodies with which Mr. Haynes had been connected. The service was conducted by the Rev. A. Farquharson, minister of the Unitarian Church, who said, in the course of his address, that the friend whose loss they mourned did not outlive his time, but was always in touch with it. Tolerant, rational, and independent, he was at once one of the most modest, yet one of the most courageous of men. A convinced lover of civil and religious liberty, his passion for Justice, Progress, and Truth was abiding and strong. One who seldom thought of self, save for the welfare of the many public and private causes he so nobly served, he was a gracious and sweet personality and his generosity was unwearied, far-reaching and sure. Like the Master he loved, he lived not to be ministered unto, but to minister. It was this quality of service, with his genial spirit, his practical aims, and his clear intellectual insight into men and affairs which brought him the trust, the confidence, and the affection of so many friends, and which gave him his commanding place in the town, on different public boards, and in his own special church which he so long, so faithfully, and so generously served. Mr. Haynes leaves no children, and his wife died four years ago.

Manchester: Longsight Free Christian Church.—A special appeal has been issued in aid of a Bazaar Fund in connection with the Free Christian Church, at Longsight, for the purpose of raising £1,250. This money is required to liquidate a mortgage of £550, the balance of an original mortgage of £850, on the church property; to replace the old organ, which was not new when originally bought, and which has served 28 years, by a new one; and to effect the necessary repairs of church and schools, which stand in real need of renovation. Since the appeal was drafted the Sanitary Committee of the Corporation have given notice that the drainage requires certain alterations which will involve considerable outlay. The writers of the appeal point out that the church has struggled hard to avoid becoming a burden to denominational funds, as official records dealing with its beginnings show. Begun in 1866 on the initiative of a few earnest souls, without wealth or social influence, it has all along striven to be self-supporting, and has been for more than 20 years entirely independent of outside aid. This condition of things the members desire to maintain. At the present moment they stand at what they believe is a fruitful crisis in their church life. The labours and sacrifices of the past have earned for them a great opportunity. They have fine church and school premises worth about £7,000, a growing congregation, consisting to a remarkable extent of men and women not hitherto connected with liberal Christianity, and an able and willing staff of workers. The future is promising. The position of the church will assure rather than threaten its prosperity for many years to come. The neighbourhood is a residential one, offering a fine field for enlightened progressive religious work, and so far as can be seen adequate assistance at this crisis of the life of the church would set its members free for purely spiritual work for another generation. The treasurer is Mr. John Chorlton, 2, Beresford-road, Longsight, Manchester.

Middlesborough: Christ Church Guild.—The Guild of Christ Church celebrated its 11th anniversary on Thursday, January 25, when a conversazione was held. The Rev. W. Rosling, of Bradford, gave an interesting address and several friends contributed items to a musical programme.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting of the Union was held at Boston Mills School, Hyde, on Saturday last. About 90 persons were present from twelve of the schools in the Union. After tea, a meeting of the Committee was held, when it was decided to hold a musical festival in October, and other necessary business was transacted. The President, Mr. Radcliffe Firth, of Mossley, presided at this and at the evening meeting. At the latter, the Rev. Herbert E. Perry, of Stockport, read an interesting paper on "Systematic Teaching in Sunday Schools." A good discussion followed, taken part in by the Revs. A. Thornhill, E. H. Pickering, Walter Short, and Messrs. G. Cocks, J. E. Williamson, and W. Woodall.

Sheffield and District Association of Churches.—The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, hon. secretary of the Sheffield and District Association of Churches, writes:—"Will you kindly allow me to supplement your notice of the formation of the new Sheffield and District Association of Churches, by stating that the separation from the Yorkshire Unitarian Union of several of the churches contained in the Association has been effected with the utmost goodwill on both sides. It is regarded as a necessary condition for the doing of better work in South Yorkshire. I regret that when sending the notice I did not state that as part of the inaugural proceedings the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds, conducted the service and reached an excellent missionary sermon in the Upper Chapel, and that several times in the sermon he referred to the good feeling existing between the Yorkshire Union and the new Association."

Shrewsbury: Free Christian Church.—On Thursday, the 25th ult., in connection with the High-street Free Christian Church Sunday school, the annual tea party and entertainment were held. The Rev. W. Stephens presided, and Miss Tounley presented the prizes. Four scholars were awarded special prizes by Mrs. Myers for never having missed a single attendance, two for nine years, one for three years, and another for one year.

Stratford and Forest Gate.—The Guild at Stratford held a social evening on January 10. The President (Rev. John Ellis) and Mrs. Ellis sent out invitations to the members of both congregations, teachers, elder scholars, and other friends to join with them in the celebration of their silver wedding. A large company assembled, and a very enjoyable evening was spent. Congratulations were offered on behalf of the congregations by Messrs. B. V. Storr, W. J. Noel, and Geo. Edwards, and a presentation of a handsome silver fruit bowl, suitably inscribed, was made to Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, as a token of affection and esteem. The annual scholars' party took place at Stratford on Saturday, January 13. After tea, the children gave an entertainment. In the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, through family bereavement, Mr. W. J. Noel presided, and Mrs. Noel distributed the prizes. The annual scholars' party was held at Forest Gate on Friday, January 19. After tea, parents and friends were invited to an entertainment given by the children, under the direction of Mrs. Brown and Miss Bolden. The Rev. John Ellis presided, and spoke on the work of the Sunday school. Addresses were also given by Mrs. Brown and Mr. E. N. Waterson.

Swansea.—The anniversary services were held on January 21, and were conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, who preached morning and evening to large congregations. The annual meeting of the congregation was held on the 25th ult. The report was presented by Mr. C. H. Perkins, the hon. secretary. Mrs. Reid gave a report of the Postal Mission work in which allusion was made to the extensive correspondence in connection with it and the many appreciative letters received. The Sunday school report was presented by Mr. Burchell.

PRESENT CONDITIONS IN THE CONGO.

The recently published report of the Rev. John H. Harris, organising secretary to the committee of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, on the result of his latest investigations in the Congo, is very reassuring up to a certain point. The question of enforcing taxation, however, is one which raises many important issues, and there still seems to be some possibility of a return to the reactionary methods of the former régime. "It is probable," says Mr. Harris, "that under the old régime atrocities of the most revolting nature were daily occurrences in one part or another of this extensive area; moreover, it is an established fact that within fifteen years many thousands of men, women, and even children were murdered in order to extort rubber from these distant regions. We are glad to be able to report that throughout our inquiries we have not as yet discovered any outrages upon the persons of the natives, nor have any been reported to us. This is, we feel, a unique tribute to British diplomacy, to the forces of public opinion, and the persistent efforts of reformers both in this country and in Belgium; for it is beyond question that this changed condition of affairs has been brought about solely by these mediums."

Mr. Harris continues: "Whilst we are privileged to chronicle so great an improvement we regret to find that much of the old régime still remains, and what is of graver moment the greater part of the personnel appear to be wedded to the corrupting principles of Leopoldianism. Nor is this surprising when it is remembered that the authorities in Brussels are selecting or allowing to be selected for prominent positions many of the old officials, not a few of whom so thoroughly believed in the principles of the old régime that the administrative centres, Basankusu, Lisala and Coquihatville, became notorious throughout the civilised world for the horrors which were committed under the very eyes of these men, who are to-day returning to the Congo with increasing power and position, and this in spite of the confirmed stories attaching to Yandjali, Baringa, Wangata and Bokakata. These men are unfortunately impregnating younger and more inexperienced minds with their views. There is reason to fear that the high water mark of reform has been attained, and that a reaction may soon begin; should this fear be realised the presence of this reactionary personnel may bring about a state of affairs but little removed from that of former days."

THE LATE HENRY YOUNG, OF LIVERPOOL.

The death, at the advanced age of 90, of Mr. Henry Young, senior partner of the firm of Henry Young & Sons, Liverpool, destroys one of the last links connecting the present time with the Liverpool of Dr. Martineau's day. Mr. Young was one of the most interesting figures in the book-selling trade. He was widely read, especially in theology, mathematics, and science, a strenuous and untiring worker, a great believer in exercise and fresh air, and deeply interested in the future of the human race. He was for many years a member of Hope-street Church, and was essentially a man of liberal ideas. His devotion to work was extraordinary, and it is said that he was fifty-four years of age before he had an unbroken fortnight's holiday. He had visited France, Switzerland, and Madeira, and was in the United States of America during the Civil War. From the age of sixty until his death Mr. Young was a most enthusiastic cyclist, and covered many thousands of miles in this way in almost every county in England, Scotland and Wales.

THE CHINESE AND THE OPIUM QUESTION.

Dr. Wu Lien-Teh, better known in England as Dr. Tuck, said, in addressing a meeting of Friends in London last week, that although the suppression of the opium habit is proceeding, morphine and cocaine are being secretly introduced into China in such large quantities as to constitute a new and formidable evil. The hope of the future, however, as he has pointed out to a representative of the Daily News, lies in the earnest desire of the Chinese people themselves to root out the disease, and equip themselves for the part they are destined to play in the history of the world. "The sense of nationhood," he said, "is far keener than Europe generally supposes. True, the provinces are largely independent of one another, but the bond of a common written language is wonderfully strong. At the bottom of the great upheaval that is now going on there lies a realisation of nationality—a realisation that China, as a whole, has been left behind, particularly by Japan, whose people we regard as in many respects inferior. 'Why is this?' the proud Chinese have been asking. They have formed certain opinions as to the reason, and the present political disturbances are the result."

LONDON UNIVERSITY.

The Senate of the London University has accepted the offer of an anonymous donor to provide at University College for the teaching of architecture, sculpture, and eugenics at a cost of £30,000. A scheme for the endowment of the teaching of home science and economics in connection with King's College for Women, for which £50,000 has been promised, is also being arranged, while a sum of £614, raised by Mrs. J. R. Green for the endowment of Celtic, is gratefully accepted.

COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING IN NEW ZEALAND.

The National Peace Council has received letters recently from the National Peace and Anti-Militarist Council of New Zealand, which show that the attempt to enforce compulsory military training in the Dominion under the Defence Act has met with the strongest opposition, and has, for the time being, practically broken down. The following facts are of no little interest:—The Anti-Militarist Council has succeeded in making the agitation against the scheme so strong that the Government have not enforced it. Several lads were prosecuted for non-registration at the outset, and two were imprisoned for three weeks each. Then the Council decided to defend a case that was brought on against a lad of the city of Christchurch. This came to the ears of the Minister of Defence, and when the Council appeared in court with their lawyer, and the case was called on, it was withdrawn by order of the Defence Department. And since then there have been no further prosecutions. The boys have ignored all notices to come to parades, and now the whole thing has been practically abandoned for the time being. It is understood that the Government are disposed to modify the scheme, but the military men still say that with the New Year it will be rigidly enforced. But it would be harder for them to do it now, after showing weakness, than it would have been if they had been firm from the start.

* * *

The Anti-Militarist Council now fears that the Act will be allowed to become a dead letter, and will be left on the Statute Book, and, at some future time a scare will be engineered and the scheme enforced. Accordingly they have determined not to let the matter rest until the measure is repealed. The Prime Minister has promised that there will be no more prosecutions, the camps have been abandoned, military instruction will not be given, but only physical instruction to boys in the Public Schools; at the same time he pleads for a fair trial of a year or two to be given to the scheme. The Peace and Anti-Militarist Movement is gaining ground every day, and there are now over 11,000 in the city of Christchurch who have signed the Council's protest, the population of the city being between 60,000 and 70,000. The movement is also making headway in other centres, and Anti-Militarist Leagues are being formed wherever possible. There are sixteen such leagues working under the direction of the National Peace and Anti-Militarist Council, and thirty others are in process of formation.

ANNUITIES AND THEIR USES.

SOME INTERESTING EXAMPLES.

INCOMES INCREASED FOURFOLD.

Although a good deal has been written of late about Annuities, there is still a great lack of information on the part of many regarding this very convenient and useful form of investment. For example, Annuities are associated in the minds of most people with old age, and while many are ready to admit that a purchase of an Annuity is a very excellent thing in the evening of life, it occurs to comparatively few that the easiest way to secure a good Annuity for one's declining years is to begin earlier in life by paying the purchase money in comparatively small annual instalments.

Many Contingencies.

The contingencies that may be provided for by Annuities and the methods of making these provisions are almost innumerable, and yet are very simple and easily understood. Perhaps the clearest way of illustrating some of them is to give a few examples selected from the registers of one of the great companies making a speciality of this class of business.

Example, a retired solicitor with impaired health, aged 74, deposits £6,000, and receives an Annuity of £1,000 payable for life, thus increasing his income fourfold.

Joint Life and Survivorship.

Four sisters, aged 35, 37, 43, and 44, paid £2,000 and are guaranteed an Annuity of £114 per year, payable quarterly, reducing by £25 per year on the first, second and third death.

Three sisters, aged 62, 69, and 72, deposit £1,500 and receive a joint Annuity of £135, payable half-yearly until the death of the last survivor.

A husband, aged 75, and wife, aged 70, whose total worldly possessions amount to £2,000, on which they were realising £80 per annum, invested the whole in an Annuity, realising at once a joint income of £239, paid half-yearly during their joint lives, to be reduced to £179 after the death of the first.

Thirty per cent. to an Invalid.

An invalid lady, aged 59, having £3,000 capital invested at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., was thus limited to an income of £105 a year, out of which she had to pay heavy doctor's bills and the salary of her nurse. She invested one half (£1,500) in an immediate annuity with the Sun of Canada. Her health was so seriously impaired that she was granted £450 per annum, payable quarterly, though ordinarily she would only have been entitled to £123 6s. 6d. if in good health. She thus at once increased her income to £450 annually and still has £1,500 capital to leave to her estate.

Best Use for the Remnant of a Fortune.

A lady aged 52, possessing only £800, the remnant of a fortune of over £10,000, which has been frittered away in bad investments, learned for the first time about Annuities from a friend, and, acting on his advice, purchased with this small remnant an Annuity. As she was in poor health, the Company, as its custom is, gave her specially favourable terms, and allowed her an Annuity of £120, as against the mere £30 she had been drawing in dividends on her £800. Had she met her friend sooner and brought her whole fortune of £10,000, she would have had a sure income for life of £1,500 a year.

A Little at a Time.

Twelve years ago a gentleman, when aged 52, occupying an official position in London, but contemplating retirement on attaining 60, decided whenever he found himself with £50 or £100 and upwards, to purchase Annuities. This he did over a period of six or eight years, sometimes making two or three purchases at short intervals.

He now finds himself with no less than 42 Annuity Bonds, and his income from the total savings brings him in some £50 per month, payable for the remainder of his life.

Husband and Wife.

A gentleman, 54, with a delicate wife, aged 49, and no children, buys an Annuity of £800 a year costing £10,100. The Company guarantees that even if he should die to-morrow the payments will be continued for ten years. In order that the wife shall absolutely be provided for, if she is still alive at the end of the ten years she has the privilege of paying another £1,500 and having the £800 yearly continued throughout the remainder of life.

Saving Up for a Rainy Day.

All of these examples refer to immediate Annuities. We will now give examples of deferred Annuities:—

A young man, 26, by depositing £13 2s. yearly, secures an income of £100 a year, beginning at 60.

A nurse aged 30, pays £10 5s. yearly, and secures an Old Age Pension of £50, beginning at 60.

A man aged 28, feeling sure of his present income for at least ten years, pays ten annual payments of £75 each, and secures £200 a year, beginning at age 65.

Prince A., aged 31, deposited £6,814 for a deferred Annuity of £600 per annum, to begin at age 41.

Wife and Children.

The examples provide for the purchaser only. Here are a few providing for the wife and children or for parents.

A. J., aged 25, secures £100 a year for his mother, aged 65, should she survive him, at the small annual cost of £7 8s.

J. F., aged 36, wife, 34, having two children, secures an income of £200 a year for his wife should she survive him. So that the children may not be left unprovided for should the wife also die, the Company guarantees to keep up the Annuity until at least 20 annual instalments have been paid. The youngest child will therefore be of age before the payments have ceased, while, on the other hand, they never cease during the wife's life though she may attain a very advanced age. This seems a better provision than leaving a capital sum, which may be lost through poor investments. The annual cost in this case is £78 12s., which, it must be admitted, seems a very moderate sum for such an ample provision.

Provision for the Whole Family.

R. L. S., aged 40, wife the same age, makes a provision similar to the last, but for a different amount, combining with it an Old Age Pension for himself and wife. Should both live to age 60, the Company will pay an Annuity of £100 a year so long as either may live. If the husband should die before reaching 60, even if this should occur during the first few weeks or days after making his first deposit, the company will pay the wife £100 at once, and continue to pay £100 yearly throughout her life. That the children may not be left out, 20 yearly instalments are provided for in any case. This is almost as perfect a family provision as it is possible to make, for it provides for everyone, the wife, children, and self. The annual deposit in this case is £73 12s. Larger or smaller Annuities in all these examples would cost pro rata.

F. M., an accountant, aged 35, single, secures an annuity of £91 16s., half yearly, beginning at age 60. In event of his not reaching that age, his deposits are all returned. The annual deposit for this is £25 3s. It is, however, provided that, should he marry, he may from that date increase the annual deposit by £9 4s., and in addition to the other benefits secure for his wife £1,000 at his death if he should not reach 60.

Educational Annuities.

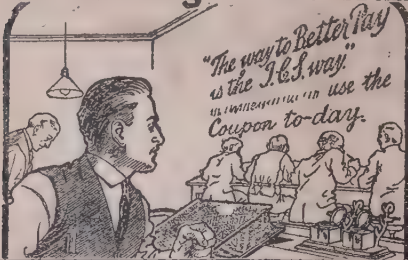

What are known as Educational Annuities for children interest almost every parent. Here are a few examples:—

G. H. J., aged 37, has a baby boy and another son aged two. He foresees that when they reach 15 their education will be getting expensive. He secures a five year Annuity of £100 for each, beginning at 15 and continuing until 19. For the first he pays 15 annual instalments of £28 4s. each, and for the second 13 instalments of £32 18s. In the event of the father's death, no further instalments will be required, and the Annuities will be paid just as if he had lived. Moreover the Company will at once begin to pay £32 19s. yearly to assist in the elementary education of the boys until they reach 15, when the Annuities of £100 to each begin.

Dr. J. L., aged 39, has one son, aged one, also set apart for the medical profession. He has provided for him five Annuities of £100 each beginning at 16, then five of £200 each for his University training, and a lump sum of £500 when he is 26 to assist in setting him up in practice. For this he pays £88 12s. 6d. yearly for the first 15 years; £60 8s. 6d. for the next five; and £17 18s. 6d. for the last five years. In the event of the father's death, no further deposits are required, and, in addition to paying the sums above mentioned on the dates arranged for, the Company will, from the day the father dies, begin to pay about £60 a year for the boy's elementary education.

These examples illustrate only a few of the contingencies of life that may be provided for more conveniently and more safely by Annuities than in any other manner. They are all taken from the records of one of the strongest financial institutions in the British Empire, the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, whose head office for the United Kingdom is 34, Canada House, Norfolk Street, Strand, W.C. Mr. J. F. Junkin, the manager, explains that it would require a large volume to deal adequately with all the different kinds of Annuities and Old Age Pensions granted by the Sun of Canada, so that inquirers should mention their age and give some idea of the nature of the provision they wish to make. All such communications will be treated as confidential. While all correspondence will receive prompt and courteous attention and will not be regarded as committing the correspondent to anything, it is requested that no one will, merely through curiosity, make inquiries which necessarily involve intricate calculations and detailed explanations.

If you are dissatisfied with your present work, your present rate of pay, if you want to improve your position, then "The Writing on the Wall" means something for you; but without investigation you will not be a step further towards materialising your ideals.

When in competition for a good job the battle is half won if you are an I.C.S. man. The simple fact that you have had an I.C.S. training tells employers that you know your business technically, theoretically, practically. I.C.S. men have their heads in their work—and employers know it.

Example:—

"At my first interview with the Manager I informed him I was a student of the I.C.S. and he replied: 'Yes, you mentioned that fact in your letter or you would not be here now'; which clearly shows the value of I.C.S. training."

(Signed) D. J. BETHELL, Nottingham.

Salary Increased 100 per cent.

"It gives me great pleasure to thank you for your kindness in obtaining for me a position. I applied to your Students' Aid Department, with the result that in a very short time you obtained for me a position carrying with it an increase of 100 per cent. in wages."

(Signed) H. ELTON, Royton, Lancs.

Let us refer you to I.C.S. students in your district.

When a man is I.C.S. trained he has become a master of his work, and he wants the best possible price for his brains and skill. In this connection the value of the work of the I.C.S. Students' Aid Department, acting hand-in-hand with over 1,000 personal representatives all over the United Kingdom and throughout the Colonies, cannot be over-estimated.

During twelve months the average increase of earnings reported by I.C.S. students reached the remarkable figure of 54 per cent. in Great Britain alone!

The I.C.S. will train you without interruption to your daily work at a cost to suit your pocket. All books free. No classes to attend. No restrictions, no extras. All preliminary information given free.

Inquire into the Facts to-day.

"The way to Better Pay is the I.C.S. way"—over 100,000 I.C.S. students affirm it is so.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE week has been one of national thanksgiving and congratulation on the safe return of the King from his mission to India. We use the word mission advisedly, for behind the pageantry there was a serious purpose of government. The human touch works wonders where official manners and despatches often fail. A sympathetic atmosphere is the surest guarantee of a good understanding. For these and other reasons, those who have watched the progress of Indian affairs rather anxiously in the past, and deplored the slowness of Indian reforms, have viewed the King's visit with deep satisfaction. When he landed at Portsmouth on Monday the King used the following words: "We have been profoundly touched by the expressions of affection and loyalty which we have received both in India and in other parts of our dominions, and we shall greatly rejoice if our presence in India shall in any way contribute to the welfare of the country, and strengthen the bonds which bind it to the Empire."

* * *

THE Prime Minister has received the following message from the Viceroy of India, who has transmitted it on behalf of the ruling princes and chiefs of India on the one hand, and the non-official members of the Legislative Council, as representing the people of British India, on the other :—

"The princes and people of India desire to take the opportunity afforded by the conclusion of the Royal visit to convey to the great English nation the expression of their cordial goodwill and fellowship, also the assurance of their warm attachment to the world-wide Empire of which they form part, and with which their destinies are now indissolubly linked. Their Imperial Majesties' visit to India, so happily conceived and so successfully completed, has produced a profound and ineffaceable impression throughout the country. Their Imperial Majesties by their gracious demeanour, their unfailing sympathy, and their deep solicitude for the welfare of all classes, have drawn closer the bonds that unite England and India, and have deepened and intensified the traditional feeling of loyalty and devotion to the Throne and person of the Sovereign which has always characterised the Indian people. Conscious of the many blessings which India has derived from the connection with England, princes and people rejoiced to tender in person their loyal and loving homage to their Imperial Majesties. They are confident that the great and historic event marks the beginning of a new era, ensuring greater happiness, prosperity, and progress to the people of India under the ægis of the Crown."

* * *

THE ease and rapidity with which the Royal visit to India has been accomplished will perhaps do something to infuse a little freshness of method into our diplomacy, which still finds the etiquette of the Court of Louis XIV. more congenial than the common-sense of the modern world. The question may readily occur, If the King can go to India, why should not the Secretary of State follow his example, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs make personal visits to Paris or Berlin? A close personal acquaintance with other countries on the part of those who hold high and responsible office would do a great deal to remove causes of friction and misunderstanding, and to cement the ties of international friendship. At present we rely far too much upon official communications and the technicalities of a traditional art of diplomacy. The difficulty is that they do not fit the modern mind, with its more human and personal way of doing things.

WE print to-day the text of a most significant protest against the use of Airships in War. We are always glad to help forward any movement which has for its object the promotion of peace and goodwill on a basis of general agreement. The signatories of this memorial point out with convincing force that "all civilisation protests its desire for peace and goodwill; protests its wish to reduce the already grievous burden of armaments. Unless its protestations be those of a hopeless hypocrite, it cannot stand and watch the conquest of the air, that most glorious of man's mechanical achievements, callously turned to the usages of destruction; it cannot idly acquiesce in a new departure that must heavily increase this burden of armaments."

IT has been pleaded that a distinction between the translation of a work and its original text is sometimes the reason why the Roman Catholic authorities are led to condemn a book and place it on the Index, though it was formerly approved. The Rev. Alfred Fawkes has explained in a letter to the Times that this excuse cannot be pleaded in the case of Mgr. Duchesne and his "Histoire ancienne de l'Eglise." Under the title "Intorno alla 'Storia Antica della Chiesa,'" the Rivista Mensile for November, 1911, publishes a communication from Mgr. Duchesne in which he deals by anticipation with this pretext :—

"On December 8 (1910), P. Lepidi informed me that he had received instructions to make no difficulty as to the French text, and also to authorise the Italian. The latter, for greater security, was subjected to a special revision, being placed under the inspection of Mgr. Faloci Pulignani, Vicar-General of Spoleto, a prelate who has not the reputation of being lenient towards novelties. While reserving to himself the right of criticism with regard to certain historical conclusions of my book, he declared clearly that he raised no difficulty from the side of theology or orthodoxy."

* * *

LAST Sunday was observed as Ecumenical Sunday by churches of the Methodist connection throughout the world. A common Message was read from the pulpit to the assembled congregations, which contains an earnest plea for closer fellowship and fuller co-operation among all Christian people. "We recognise," it says, "that the unity of the Church is a prime condition of its spiritual well-being. Yet we are convinced that within the universal communion of the Church, and as a means of its full realisation, there is, at least for the present, both a place and a need for denominations, provided they so bear themselves in relation to others as to hold the truth they have received in trust not only for their own adherents but for the Catholic Church."

* * *

ON the subject of social and national obligations the Message speaks with clearness and emphasis, showing that a movement which has its roots in an intensely individual experience can adjust itself to larger duties and new points of view. "Side by side with the endeavour after a world-embracing evangelism must go the ceaseless effort to establish a Christian civilisation in every land. The salvation of Christ must find its complete manifestation in collective as well as in individual life. The witness of Christianity to the world must be fulfilled in its social aspects and ideals. As citizens we must seek to secure in righteousness, wisdom, and complete unselfishness a truly Christian—and therefore humane—character for all law, administration, and public policy. This governing principle supplies practical guidance as to the objects that must be pursued by both our personal and collective, our private and public influence."

ENTERING into more practical details the Message continues:—"We must labour ceaselessly so to transform the material environment of the peoples that it may promote and not hamper the possibilities of a completely Christian life—with all its moral, intellectual, and even physical implications—for the weakest members of the community. We must put forth our utmost efforts to destroy the organised inducements to intemperance and impurity that bring mammon-worship and self-indulgence into devastating alliance. We must strive with all our might to protect the Christian integrity of marriage and of the home. We must uphold Christian standards of morality and humanity in the production, distribution, and use of material wealth. We must direct our utmost endeavours to secure the truly Christian education of the young. We must welcome and seek to extend the influence of women in the counsels of the Church and in the service of the community. We must guard, in all wisdom, the sanctity of the Lord's Day, showing that its due observance is as precious to all the higher needs of personal character, home life, and human efficiency as it is to the fulfilment of religious service."

At a meeting of the Christian Social Union held at Caxton Hall last week, the Bishop of Oxford made a startling indictment of the prevailing apathy of the mass of Churchpeople in regard to their social duties, and their slowness to promote practical measures of reform. Incidentally, he paid a tribute to the greater readiness of the Nonconformist to come forward with practical help. He confessed himself completely baffled when he asked himself what it was that produced this strange blindness of heart and mind among people of his own communion. We have dealt elsewhere with some aspects of this address, so deeply sincere in its confession of bewilderment, so passionate in its sympathy for the miseries of the poor.

In a subsequent letter, Dr. Gore explained that the speech was in substance as well considered as anything he could say on any subject, though its verbal expression was almost entirely extemporary. "Of course I recognise," he adds, "that there is a considerable body of Churchmen who are zealous on these subjects, but I think that what I said about the mass of our communicants is true. At the same time, I must recognise that it is quite possible, if I were a Nonconformist minister, I should still feel the same about the mass of my fellow-members."

THE Charity Organisation Society has issued an interesting report on the present condition of the poor in London. It is, on the whole, of a hopeful character. There is an absence of signs of exceptional distress; the improvement in the condition of the labour market has reached the lower classes of casual workers; in almost all cases the applications for free meals for school children have visibly diminished. At the same time, new causes of poverty are continually arising. The substitution of mechanical for horse traction has thrown out of work a large number of drivers and others employed in the care of horses. An increasing difficulty is being felt everywhere owing to the rise in prices of coal, food, and other necessities of life. As a general conclusion, the report says, "the chronic poverty of a portion of the population of London remains a hard fact to be borne constantly in remembrance."

* * *

EVERYONE will wish well to the new central buildings of the Y.M.C.A. in London. The recent campaign for subscriptions to the building fund resulted in £80,000 out of the £100,000 required. It is, however, in some danger of getting into the rough waters of controversy between old and new ideals of policy. Its new allies would like to see it conducted on lines which have been very successful in the United States and Canada, without any theological test for membership and the chilling influence of the ghost of Exeter Hall upon its social activities; whereas its old friends, who still supply most of the money, are strongly opposed to any real broadening of the basis. From a forecast which appeared in the Westminster Gazette this week, it seems likely that the ban may be withdrawn from smoking and billiards, but not from theological heresy. The spirit which once tried to exclude Punch, because it was "contemptuous of religious influences," is too strongly entrenched to yield without a vigorous struggle.

* * *

THE recent deputation to the Home Secretary on Demoralising Literature has called forth some vigorous protests on the side of authorship from Mr. Gosse, Mr. Clement Shorter and Mr. Lowes Dickinson. We have pointed out on more than one occasion the grave difficulties and dangers surrounding any attempted censorship of books. It is well to remember that Socrates was condemned for blasphemy, and that official opinion as represented by the police is generally prejudiced against what is unconventional and is prone to stigmatise it with opprobrious names.

* * *

"THERE is one thing no Government can be trusted to do," Mr. Lowes Dickinson writes in the Nation, "—and a democratic Government perhaps least of all—and that is, to censor books, directly or indirectly, by prohibition before publication, or by prosecution after it. Mr. McKenna remarked to the deputation that 'every man of common sense knows when he sees a book or a picture of a particular kind, whether the intention was artistic or whether it was mere obscenity.' If that be true, men of common sense are very rare, and are not often likely to come together on a jury. No, sir: if we are to have freedom we must take the risk of it; and if we do not take the risk we shall have no freedom."

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL REFORM.

IN the small book on "The Church and the Age" to which we referred last week the DEAN of ST. PAUL'S utters an emphatic warning against any attempt to identify the Church with a particular party or scheme of social reform. He views almost with alarm the tendency to try to win victories for religion by entering into any sort of alliance with organised Labour, or angling in the troubled waters of human misery with social reform as a bait. In spiritual work there must be no bargaining about material advantages. The Christian must remember that his Master said, "My kingdom is not of this world," and all that this strange and unpopular statement implies. "I can conceive of nothing more fatal," he says, "than the policy of enlisting the organised forces of the Church on the side of militant labour. I can recall no instance of a Church which has gone into politics and has not come out badly smirched." And again, "The main work of the Church must always be to influence the character of individuals." In striking contrast to the mental attitude which is disclosed by these words, and in apparent contradiction to it, is the strong indictment by the BISHOP of OXFORD of the prevailing apathy of members of his own communion in face of the glaring social evils of our time. "I have constantly sat down bewildered," he said in an address to the Christian Social Union at Caxton Hall last week, "before the blank and, as it seems to me, simply stupid refusal of the mass of Churchpeople, to recognise their social duties. Why on earth is it? What produces this strange blindness of heart and mind? Often have I tortured my mind trying to find an answer to these questions, and tortured it in vain. I simply recognise the fact; it stares you in the face." Dr. GORE went on to speak in burning words of our LORD's sayings about poverty and wealth, and the effect which would be produced in an ordinary congregation if anyone were to use similar language to-day.

"Look at our Lord's awful and tremendous words about wealth, words which none of us who are rich in income to-day can hear without trembling through and through. The 'poor,' whom He called 'blessed,' were they like the poor of our slums? Not a bit of it; they were men like the Apostles, of the well-to-do artisan class. Remembering what He said about the rich and the poor, and then remembering the state of our society to-day, I dare any one of you to say that what He preached was not a 'revolutionary' doctrine, which we have got over again to digest and make our own.

"Do you say He was not a social reformer? What did He do? He founded the Church—the brotherhood. If you say to me, 'I don't want to go mixing up with your dirty politics; I want to follow pure religion,' I say, 'Go and do it; that is the most revolutionary thing you can do; that is what turned the world upside down.'"

It is no doubt disconcerting to a good many people to find two of the ablest and sincerest minds in the Church of England apparently at such odds with one another upon a matter of supreme importance. The radical difference of temperament and outlook cannot be denied. The DEAN with his finely trained critical intelligence is not of the stuff of which enthusiasts are made. But he is not blind or unmoved in presence of the things which make the BISHOP's heart hot within him. "The present distribution of wealth," he affirms, "is absurd." "All human beings are essentially equal in this sense, that the moral personality is inviolable. No man or woman is to be merely used, used up, or dishonoured. So far, democracy is reminding us of one of the most original and important parts of the Christian message, and we may 'co-operate' without hesitation." Further, he is deeply impressed by the moral dangers of great wealth, and maintains that "the Church should set its face against luxury. Luxury destroys every class or nation that practises it. Nothing fails like success; it kills off families more surely than any oppression that falls short of slavery." It is a different angle of vision, certainly, but there is a fundamental agreement which it is worth while to try to put into words.

Dr. GORE is roused, so that he cries out in deep distress of spirit, by the apathy and self-satisfaction of conventional Christianity. The DEAN is concerned to preserve the deep inwardness of the Gospel in face of attempts to reduce it to the shibboleth of a party or a programme of reform. In different ways, and in face of somewhat dissimilar dangers, they are both pleading for a recovery of the mind of CHRIST. Both would agree that what is needed is the power of a new life, a life of clearer vision and more consecrated effort, and that this must come from one and the same source. The essential relation of Christianity to social reform is to be found, not in any economic doctrine or finished programme of duties, but in the new character which creates the new world. Christianity in its simplest and deepest personal expression is discipleship, and discipleship involves first of all self-surrender and self-committal to the lordship and sacrifice of love, as men have seen them and felt their power in JESUS CHRIST. All men who profess and call themselves Christians need above everything else to realise that they are committed in irrevocable honour and loyalty to a certain type of love and goodness, which is to live and work within them, and transform them into lovers of God and servants of human need.

There is here nothing which may be dismissed as vague and unpractical spirituality. Love when it is kindled to a white heat and guided by a deep personal loyalty is the most practical thing in the world. It gives the mind a new keenness as it grapples with all the details of government and reform. It sustains the heart with a cheerful courage in the dark days of disappointment and apparent defeat. It makes men glad to surrender what is precious to themselves for the common good, able to suffer and rejoice when suffering is the price of others' gain. There is nothing in the whole range of human experience, not even hot indignation against wrong or the spectacle of the hopeless miseries of the disinherited and the lost, which is so fatal to complacent comfort or so productive of practical agreements. Social reform drags slowly and heavily along, chiefly for lack of spiritual power. Its supreme need is the recovery over wide areas of life of the creativeness of the Christian character with its splendid hopefulness and its deep reserves of strength. The priceless contribution of Christianity to social reform in this and every age is not a plan of society, but the revolutionary power of a new type of character and the spirit of the Cross.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

AMERICAN CITIES.

II.

Two hours' journey from Chicago is the prosperous and handsome city of Milwaukee, also on the borders of Lake Michigan, which is at this point 83 miles across. Milwaukee is a typical American city, and its steady growth can be traced back over 70 years to the time when the first settlers erected their cabins beside the tamarack swamps, and ousted the Indians from the banks of the Menomonee River. It has, however, achieved a certain notoriety of late which it did not formerly possess, owing to its having put the Socialists in power at the last municipal election. All America is now waiting to see what Milwaukee, built upon the individualist system, and proud of having held its own in competition with Chicago, less than 100 miles away, will gain as a result of this new experiment. People express their opinion on the subject with a certain amount of caution, but even the more conservative-minded go so far as to say that the Socialist mayor is a conscientious man, though lacking in "statesmanlike qualities" (an accusation which is sometimes brought against Cabinet Ministers!), and that the administration is entirely honest and free from the taint of "graft." Milwaukee, as a matter of fact, is a very progressive city belonging to a very progressive State, and does not join in the doubtful sport of stoning the prophets even when they come in the guise of Single Taxers with Henry George's persuasive son for their mouthpiece. In the fifties it had a population of 7,000, equalling that of Chicago; at the present time it is the twelfth largest city in the United States, with a population of something like 370,000. And it is still growing, if one may judge by the size of the buildings that are being erected, and the way its borders are extending in every direction.

Here, as elsewhere, in addition to the coloured people, a very large number of the inhabitants are foreigners; Germans (the larger proportion), Italians, Poles, Swedes and the like. A Presbyterian minister told the writer that his son was in a class at school which consisted of 20 American and 40 other boys representing various European nationalities, and this tale is repeated everywhere throughout the country, until you begin to realise in some small measure the difficulties which the constant influx of foreigners is preparing for legislators in the future. The marvellous way in which these aliens are assimilated has often been commented upon, but it is not quite true that America absorbs them all without any sense of strain and insecurity. They soon acquire a semblance of that self-assertive spirit, springing from a constant insistence on the liberty of the individual, which has always been the keynote of American progress, and their children join together with a fervour unequalled in our own country in the singing of such patriotic songs as "The Star-Spangled Banner," and "My Country, 'tis of thee." It must be remembered, however, that the immigrants who are continually streaming into this vast continent, to the extent of hundreds of thousands every year, belong to the poorest and most illiterate class, and, as H. G. Wells has pointed out, they are ill-prepared to play the independent rôle which America forces upon her citizens. Consequently, they are exploited by the saloon-keeper and the professional politician, who easily influence their votes; they "weaken and confuse the counsels of labour," and "retard enormously the development of that national consciousness and will upon which the hope of the future depends."

But it is difficult to feel pessimistic even when confronted with the immigration problem in the Cream City, which is still full of the buoyancy of youth, surrounded with delightful homes set amidst green lawns and wide piazzas, and purified by the invigorating breezes which sweep across a glorious stretch of water as blue as the Mediterranean. The story of its progress naturally fills its energetic inhabitants with pride; and here, as in all flourishing American cities, many fine buildings, including the Layton Art Gallery, library, hospitals, orphanages, parks and colleges, bear testimony to the public spirit of men whose fortunes have grown as street was added to street, and who believe in enriching the community with the fruit of their labours. This is not Socialism, and the numerous philanthropists who act upon this principle throughout the United States defend the theory of individualism as strongly as Mr. Roosevelt; but it is one step towards Socialism, as that word seems likely to be interpreted in the future. Indeed, some of these liberal givers set an example, in the simplicity of their habits, the modesty of their homes, and the unselfish way in which they devote their time and money to promoting the public welfare, which many champions of the people's cause would do well to follow. It is not true that the rich are invariably selfish, while the poor are in possession of all the virtues; and if, in the days to come, the State collectively is made more and more responsible for the happiness and well-being of its citizens, it would be ungracious not to remember how often the individual has shown the State its duty by building such splendid institutions as Milwaukee, among other cities, can boast.

And then there is Boston, the proud city of the three peaks on the broad and beautiful Charles River; the one-time "hub of the universe," the home of many historical memories; the shrine to which enthusiastic pilgrims come from all parts of the world to tread the streets where famous Abolitionists were mobbed, or gaze up at the windows of old-fashioned houses which once sheltered such men as Emerson, Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Theodore Parker, Lloyd Garrison, or William Ellery Channing. But it does not do to visit Boston fresh from a perusal of the "Breakfast Table" series, or Miss Crawford's delightful studies of the lovable old town in days that seem, in many respects, as remote as the age of Pericles. For you are confronted, as you leave the station, not by quaint buildings and picturesque churches, but by tall factories and the elevated railway; and although there is a certain charm about the narrow, crooked streets after the rectangular lines of Chicago or New York, they impress you first of all chiefly with the fact that they are dirty and overcrowded. Even the historical Common is overshadowed by huge hotels and other high buildings, and gashed by the yawning mouth of the useful but disfiguring Subway. In fact, you have to dig out the ancient landmarks from amidst the welter and commercialism of a modern city, forming in your mind as well as you can, and as often as possible with closed eyes, the picture of old Boston as it must have looked when the daring promoters of the Liberator were advocating the immediate emancipation of the slave, and Wendell Phillips was making the walls of the "Cradle of Liberty" echo to his impassioned eloquence.

Boston has, indeed, become a hustling centre of commerce, with fine shops and beautiful suburbs, which preserves its traditions of ancient culture and the memory of its literary men in certain quiet nooks and pleasant homes, while it moves on with the tide of progress in a go-ahead manner entirely alien to the spirit of the Brook Farmers or the philosophers of Concord. Nothing could have impressed this upon one's mind more forcibly than the recent procession on Columbus Day (a new State holiday), when over 30,000 citizens joined in a monster parade which took three hours to pass a given point. It was a wonderful and bewildering show, saved from monotony (although the men who took part in it were, for the most part, dressed in conventional modern garb) by a lavish display of banners and pennons rich with every possible combination of colour, and by the really picturesque tableaux arranged on huge "floats" which broke up the procession at intervals. Then there were detachments of troops, sailors, Indians, and young cadets in white uniforms laced with crimson; but the significant thing about the whole display was the enormous preponderance of Roman Catholics representing various societies of the Holy Name and the Knights of Columbus. The Catholic missions were very much to the fore, even Chinese "converts" having turned out to add the music of their native instruments to the blare of over 100 bands; and the number of Italians, Poles, and Portuguese who took part in the parade must have made some of the spectators feel as if they were witnessing a great religious demonstration in one of the mediæval cities of Europe, rather than a procession intended to stimulate patriotic pride and enterprise in the birth-place of American independence.

Thus the old and the new mingle, and if a more significant sign of the times were needed, it is only necessary to climb to the top of Chestnut or Curey Hill, and look out over the city lying below with the Charles River threading its way majestically under the leafy slopes of Brookline. From there you see the imposing dome of the huge Christian Science Church, which puts even the gilded cupola of the State House to shame. It dominates the scene as the Duomo dominates the city of Florence when you look down upon it from the heights above San Miniato, and the sight is apt to depress the liberal religious thinker who has just paid a visit to the King's Chapel, with its decorous family pews, and reflected proudly on the noble part which such fearless champions of freedom as Emerson, Channing, and Theodore Parker have displayed in the history of Boston. But the Christian Scientists have to be taken into account, for they, too, are contributing no small share to the upbuilding of a mighty nation, and it no longer seems strange, when you have spent a few weeks in America, that this new religious cult should have sprung up in the heart of a people solely absorbed, to all intents and purposes, in the development of a marvellously fertile country and the acquisition of great wealth. It is, after all, the direct outcome of that spirit of optimism which seems to possess everyone in the United States, from Luther Burbank, doubling the bounties of nature, and producing fruits which nature would never have thought of among his vines and orchards in California, to the humblest Italian mechanic laying trolley-lines in Pennsylvania. It is also a testimony to the force and persistence of those eternal needs and aspirations of the soul which have made man an easy prey in times past to consoling superstitions, and may do so again, until he has learnt that soothing dogmas are far less important than those daily and hourly acts which are fraught with such irreparable consequences for himself and humanity.

GREGORY THE GREAT.

WE have all of us read in our school histories Bede's story of Gregory seeing the fair-haired Saxon slaves in the market-place, and saying that they were not Angles but angels, and determining to save the inhabitants of Deira "de ira Dei." It is pleasant to have our own history thus directly linked with the most characteristic figure in the Christian world of the last half of the sixth century. Such Gregory undoubtedly was. His most striking characteristics are a superstitious credulity, which in any other age would have been puerile, and a shrewd common sense which would be virile in any age. He says in one of his prefaces that he wonders that anyone who has Augustine and Ambrose should want him to write anything. There was good ground for the wonder, yet Gregory became more popular than either of the others.

His "Pastoral Care," the manual which Alfred translated for the use of his clergy, shows a knowledge of human nature not easily surpassed. His huge Commentary on Job, the "Magna Moralia," is the most stupendous monument to the futility of allegorical exegesis when regarded as a means of reaching the mind of the writer, and its amazing effectiveness, in the hands of a master, when regarded as a means of reaching the conscience of the reader. What are you to make of the system of interpretation of which the following is a fair specimen?

"In sacred Scripture the name of the horse sometimes expresses the lubricious life of the depraved, sometimes temporal dignity, sometimes this present age, sometimes the preparation of a righteous purpose, and sometimes the holy preacher." ("Magna Moralia," xxxi. 43.)

In the magnificent description of the war horse in the Book of Job it is the "holy preacher" that the beast represents. Parsons are hardly accustomed to such compliments! Close upon this follows the great passage in which Gregory elaborates the scheme of the seven Capital Vices (generally but incorrectly known as the seven deadly sins), from the grip of which the practical conscience of Europe has never since been able to free itself. These pages are as full as they can hold of keen observation and practical wisdom. Take a single specimen. In his enumeration Avarice comes next after "Dismalness," "Depression," or "Don't Careness" (subsequently enfeebled into "Sloth" or "Slackness"), and Gregory explains that there is a natural affinity between them, because those in whom the inward sources of joy have ceased to flow are all the more restless in their desire to cling to the outward signs and supports of the happiness which they cannot feed from within.

He was no theologian, yet the first distinct formulating of the doctrine of Purgatory, which saved the whole scheme of Catholic belief concerning the future life from patent absurdity, is traced by the theologians to him. Neither was he a great philosopher or a great mystic, yet his matter-of-fact way of dealing with some of the problems of philosophy and some of the experiences of the mystic carry us into regions to which his common-sense seldom attains. His quiet explanation of the experience of the saint who saw the whole world in a single ray of light is worth a good deal of artificial mystic analysis, and the case of the "idealist" was never more convincingly put than in the few words wherein Gregory meets the statement that it is hard to believe in the invisible by the counter-statement that it is only the invisible that can see anything at all. We cannot, it is true, see the soul going out of the body that dies. Very well. Then it is only an invisible something that makes the difference between a live and a dead body, and as the dead body cannot see, it is only the invisible part of the living man that sees. In other words, it is only to the invisible mind that there can be any evidence at all that visible matter so much as exists.

Gregory's age was one of profound superstition. Augustine, some two centuries before, believed in miracles, indeed, but it is difficult to conceive of the miraculous legends growing around his name which encompass that of Gregory, and equally difficult to conceive of his collecting such a group of stories as we find in Gregory's "Dialogues," some account of which appeared recently in these columns. Here miracles, from the re-uniting of a broken kitchen utensil to the raising of the dead, are told with the easiest and most unquestioning faith, and yet Gregory's common sense is never more conspicuous than in relation to this very love of the marvellous, for he steadfastly refuses to take miraculous power as a conclusive test of character. Was not Paul the equal of Peter? Yet Peter walked upon the water and Paul suffered shipwreck. We are not to neglect human precautions or neglect human calculations in our zeal for souls or our trust in divine help. Did not Paul provide himself with a rope and a basket and look out for a suitable window when Damascus seemed an undesirable place in which to stay and a difficult place from which to escape? And you must not be too sure that events are miraculous. A certain man foresaw that he was to be buried in a particular church on the Apian Way. No one had any intention of burying him there, yet by a pure accident it came about. But this man was a worldly person. We are to conclude, therefore, that although men when drawing nigh to death often foresee the future by divine revelation, the soul sometimes sees it by its own subtlety as it comes near to its separation from the body, for this man was not good enough to have been favoured with a revelation. And, after all, was not Paul's conversion a more marvellous thing than the raising of Lazarus from the dead; and is not Scripture justified in attaching supreme importance to the career of one who had experienced the miracle of a changed inner life, and leaving untold that of the other who had but experienced a renewal of the material life?

BERGSON AND MARTINEAU.

SIR,—I am beginning to fear that it may be a dangerous thing to call attention in the columns of THE INQUIRER to the work of a new constructive thinker. The person who does so exposes himself to the risk of being suspected of disloyalty to Dr. Martineau. I have not been lucky in this respect. Applying the word "wooden" to a class of minds which is very common in the world at large, but to which Dr. Martineau's is essentially in direct antithesis, Professor Upton immediately suspects me of unfairness and disrespect to his own and to his great master's philosophy. Mr. Editor, it is a little hard—especially on one like myself who does not yield, even to Professor Upton himself, in my estimate of the value of Dr. Martineau's work.

If there are any among us, and I sometimes suspect there may be, who hold that any teaching which agrees with Martineau's is unnecessary and that any teaching which differs from it is false, I am sure that Martineau himself, could he still speak, would have something very severe to say to them. And Professor Upton would be quick to second his rebuke. All the more pity, therefore, that he should inadvertently say anything which, even by indirection, could be construed into approval of this ridiculous and most disloyal form of discipleship.

Now it so happens that Bergson and Martineau follow the same road sufficiently far to reach agreement in most of the matters which are dearest to Professor Upton. In Martineau's chapter on "Hedonism and Evolution" (and elsewhere) there is a most remarkable, though incidental, anticipation of Bergson's doctrine of Evolution créatrice. Both thinkers are Intuitionists, though not in precisely the same forms; both are pledged through and through to the doctrine of Freedom. The main difference is, that in regard to Intuition and Freedom Bergson goes much further than Martineau. Bergson's Intuitionism has a wider sweep, and his Freedom is more deeply pervasive of the structure of the universe. Seeing this agreement clearly, as I do, or believing that I see it; repeating it constantly to my class and whenever I have an opportunity of writing or speaking on the subject, it is inconceivable that I should make use of Bergson's doctrines for pouring scorn on the doctrines of Dr. Martineau.

Were I, then, to name the thinkers I had in mind when I used the word "wooden," not only would Dr. Martineau's name be absent from the list, but the names in the list would be precisely those which Professor Upton himself might recognise as deserving the epithet. I do not withdraw the word. I emphasise it. "Wooden" thinking is prevalent, especially in Morals; it is highly mischievous, and it affords an excellent illustration of Bergson's Philosophy of the Comic. That is why I alluded to it in attempting to explain Bergson's answer to the question, "why do we laugh?"—Yours, &c.,

RELIGION AND PERSONALITY.

SIR,—As Mr. Roberts has thought fit, very needlessly, to drag me into his letter, and has allowed his controversial zeal to turn his own imaginings into "recollections," I must crave space for a few words on a matter of fact. The question which Mr. Roberts says I was asked was never put to me; therefore I never answered it, and consequently am not responsible for a helpless and foolish reply on behalf of right, centre, and left (whatever these may be) which is attributed to me. I have little doubt that Mr. Roberts must have been thinking, in a confused way, of a statement which I once had occasion to make, that, even if the mythological hypothesis of the origin of Christianity were established, it would not destroy "liberal Christianity," because one form of "liberal Christianity" had long regarded the religion as "a system of spiritual truth, which, when once the world has acquired it, is wholly independent of its historical origin." At the same time I intimated that that view did "not appear to me adequate or satisfying." The connection in which the statement was made did not require me to do more. The passage referred to is in THE INQUIRER of December 24, 1910.

Of course, I am convinced that Mr. Roberts would not for a moment make a wilful misrepresentation; but, knowing the errors of memory, and the ease of misrepresentation, I think it is always safest to verify one's facts. I have myself followed this rule, and have found that in the present instance my memory was perfectly correct.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES DRUMMOND.

Oxford, February 5.

SIR,—Most of us will probably be in sympathy with the point of view which the Rev. H. D. Roberts has so ably presented. No finite form can stand to us for God. We feel that He transcends all forms; that there is a beyond where He must be in all His fulness, and yet He girts us about so that we feel He is not far from any one of us. And yet all forms must contain Him, otherwise we create that gulf between God and man which we are told is the bane of some theological thinking. If we think of God as above all forms, we get only an abstract conception which lacks reality for most people, consequently they are thrown back on themselves and become coldly individualistic. If, on the other hand, we regard Him as manifested in one unique human form, then the vision, though clear cut and supplying attractive warmth, is limited. Only the mystic rises above these difficulties and sees the divine within and without. But he is regarded with disfavour in quarters where common sense is supposed to prevail; nevertheless, I side with the mystics.

But we do not escape anthropomorphism even if Christ does not stand to us for God. Dr. Martineau pointed out that the Father, as the Unitarian conceives Him, stands in almost the same relation to the worshipper as the Christ does to the Trinitarian. The attributes of fatherhood are projected in thought into an ideal person who is worshipped as God. Christ is also an ideal man, clothed with the attributes of the Gospel figure of Jesus, whose real lineaments are unknown. Both conceptions are anthropomorphic, as may be shown by the fact that Unitarians often use hymns, originally inspired by the worship of Jesus, in which the word Father has simply been substituted for Jesus. The subject is tempting, but must not be followed.

The question raised is not merely academic. Only last week, in a society over which I have the privilege to preside, where religious questions are freely discussed, a young man said, "I find it very hard to think of God apart from Jesus. He appears only as a cloud which soon vanishes away." And a few years ago a man of ripe years, a constant attendant at one of our churches, remarked to me, "I find it very difficult to realise God. He seems so far off." Probably most of our preaching is uneducative, and conversational classes would be far more helpful. Anyhow, it is clear that without the idea of God imaged in man, the sense of the divine grows very dim in some. On the other hand, we meet people to-day, not all of one Church, who testify to "a God consciousness." This seems to me to be quite a new testimony.

It may be helpful to mention that Eucken, in his "Truth of Religion," points out that though we make God and not Christ the centre of our religion, "yet such a man as Jesus is not the mere bearer of doctrines or of a special frame of mind, but is a convincing act and proof of the Divine Life. . . . Such a life, with its incomparable nature and mysterious depths, does not exhaust itself through historical effects, but humanity can from hence ever return afresh to its inmost essence, and strengthen itself ever anew through the certainty of a new pure and spiritual world in contrast to the meaningless aspects of nature and the vulgar mechanism of a purely human culture."

Mr. Roberts makes a reference to Liberal Christians which is not quite clear. Liberal Christianity has a history of nearly one hundred years, and must not be identified with any one phase of thought. In the Liberal Christian or Free Christian attitude (I can discover no difference in the meaning of these two terms) I venture to think lies the promise of the future. If I may attempt to define that attitude, I should say that it recognises the essence of Christianity to lie, not in doctrine, but in a principle of life. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." "Every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God." "Her sins are forgiven, for she loved much"—here is the inmost essence of the Gospel. But intellectually, Liberal Christianity sees the need of changing forms of thought with advancing knowledge. It therefore welcomes all believers who hold their creeds undogmatically, seeing that the essence of Christianity lies elsewhere.

This, I venture to say, is the latest aspect of Liberal Christianity, and it is working. In small societies members of the various sects are coalescing and rising to the consciousness of a common spiritual life beyond their differences. Thus, again, it is proved that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." Ought not this principle to find its true field in our Open Trust Churches?

I agree with every word of Mr. Roberts' last paragraph, but to create a kingdom of personalities there must be some unifying principle, and if that principle be love, he will be greatest who loves most.—Yours, &c.,

* * A CORRECTION.—The Rev. H. D. Roberts writes:—"The phrase in 'Religion and Personality' which reads 'confounded in fact' is really more descriptive than my own which was 'unfounded in fact.'"

THE CHARLES DICKENS CENTENARY.

SIR,—Perhaps you will allow me to point out one or two slight errors in the pleasant paper on Charles Dickens by W. B. O. George "Cruikshank" (sic)—is not the "c" superfluous?—is said to have "illustrated the later portion of the 'Pickwick Papers.'" This is a mistake. George Cruikshank had nothing to do with illustrating "Pickwick."

An early impression of the first edition of that work is before me as I write. It contains the suppressed Buss plates. Turning to page 47, I find poor Seymour's last plate—Winkle trying to lead the refractory stud. Seymour's suicide made a difficulty for author and publisher. R. W. Buss, an artist famous for theatrical subjects, was applied to. He submitted two designs, "The Cricket Match," to face p. 69, and the "fat boy" discovering Mr. Tupman and Miss Wardle, p. 74. These did not suit Dickens, and they were suppressed in all but the early impression of the first edition. Hablot K. Browne or "Phiz" illustrated the rest of the work. W. B. O. is mistaken in believing that the "Memoirs of Grimaldi," produced 1838, was "the last book which appeared under the nom de plume of Boz." "Sketches of Young Couples, &c.," 1840, and later, appear under the same nom de plume.

It is well, perhaps, that these trifling inaccuracies should be pointed out. They do not diminish the charm of a delightful paper.—Yours, &c.,

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

Bridgwater, February 5, 1912.

SIR,—Surely Dr. Blake Odgers, in his interesting article in your issue of the 3rd inst., is wrong in saying that "The Memoirs of Grimaldi" was the last book for which Dickens used his pseudonym. It would, I think, be more correct to say that after this, either "Boz," or "Charles Dickens" appeared on the title-page, just as suited the fancy of his publishers or himself. Take, for instance, "the extensive and peculiar" title-page of "Martin Chuzzlewit"—I quote from memory;—"Martin Chuzzlewit, a complete record of his Wills and his Ways; what he did and what he didn't; showing, moreover, who came in for the silver spoons and who for the wooden ladles, the whole forming a complete key to the House of Chuzzlewit, edited by Boz."

Again, is it not an understatement of the case to say that Dickens learned a little law? It is true that he made slips in dealing with legal matters, e.g., in "Bardell v. Pickwick," where he allows Serjeant Buzfuz to cross-examine his own witnesses without first obtaining the leave of the Court, which even Mr. Justice Stareleigh would not have allowed; but for a layman his knowledge of law was wonderful, and did we know as little about the personality of the author of "David Copperfield" as we do about that of the author of "Hamlet," there can be but little doubt that, just as some critics attribute the authorship of Shakespeare's plays to Bacon because, they say, only a lawyer could have been so accurate on matters of law, so others would for the like reason assert that the novels of Dickens were written by Mr. Justice Talfourd or some other distinguished literary lawyer of the first half of the Victorian era. Is not the date of "Pickwick" 1836, not 1834?—Yours, &c.,

FREDK. G. JACKSON.

[Mr. Jackson is right about his main fact, but the full title of "Martin Chuzzlewit" was as follows:—"The Life and Adventures of Martin Chuzzlewit, his Relatives, Friends, and Enemies, comprising all his Wills and his Ways: with an historical record of what he did, and what he didn't: showing, moreover, who inherited the family plate, who came in for the silver spoons, and who for the wooden ladles. The whole forming a complete key to the House of Chuzzlewit. Edited by Boz." "The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club" began to appear in illustrated numbers on March 31, 1836.—ED. OF INQ.]

THE ANGLO-GERMAN FRIENDSHIP SOCIETY.

APPEAL FOR £5,000.

SIR,—We venture to beg the hospitality of your columns for an appeal for funds on behalf of the Anglo-German Friendship Society. This Society was inaugurated on May 1, 1911, with the main object of making a determined effort to establish a better feeling between Great Britain and Germany. It is believed that only by persistent effort on cautious and tactful lines can any important influence be brought to bear upon public opinion, and a real and permanent change in sentiment be effected; wherefore under the guidance of those with experience and knowledge of the relations between Great Britain and Germany we propose to take active steps to this end.

The object which the Society has in view will, we believe, meet with the sympathy of the overwhelming majority of the British people irrespective of political party, for we believe that only by a cordial understanding between Great Britain and Germany can the peace of the world be fairly secured, and in order to carry out our proposals it is necessary for us to make a strong appeal for financial assistance.

We shall gratefully accept any assistance from whomsoever it may come, but our object can only be successfully attained by the substantial contributions of wealthy sympathisers, thus enabling us to inaugurate an active policy of enlightenment and conciliation which may have decisive effect upon public sentiment in both countries. It is estimated that each public meeting costs about £50; it would, therefore, be unwise to rest satisfied with a sum less than £5,000; and those who have little or no opportunity for active personal service may feel assured that their donations are equally essential to the vitality and progress of as good a cause as ever was placed before the public. We have the honour to remain—Yours obediently, AVEBURY, President.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE PERSONALITY OF SOCRATES.

Varia Socratica. By Professor A. E. Taylor.

THE personality of Socrates, if less important to the modern world, is yet as full of a haunting fascination as that of Jesus; and one may also add that, in spite of all the treatises written upon it, it is just as elusive. Both alike are enveloped in the dust of controversy as to the relative objectivity and value of the delineations of nearly contemporary authorities, and both are obscured by what may very appropriately be called the cloud of witnesses.

In the case of Socrates the four primary ancient authorities are Xenophon, Plato, Aristotle, and Aristophanes; but modern scholars are altogether at loggerheads as to the worth of their testimony. Adam, in his "Religious Teachers of Greece," still pins his faith to the hardly entreated Xenophon; while Joël, in his great work, "Der echte und der Xenophontische Sokrates," is inclined to treat him as an old woman babbling of things beyond the reach of her domestic intelligence. Gomperz, like Joël, swears by Aristotle; while Döring proves conclusively, I think, in his "Lehre des Sokrates" that Aristotle gets all he has to say from Plato, and that as a first-hand authority he is little good. As for Xenophon, Döring regards him as a very decent, well-intentioned incompetent. Plato he takes as good in parts. And now comes Professor Taylor, in his recent volume, "Varia Socratica," who swallows Plato holus bolus, tosses Xenophon into the air, re-proves Aristotle's entire dependence on Plato, after Döring, but apparently without knowing this, and, to add to the interest of the comedy, reinstates Aristophanes as a first-rate authority on the philosopher of the den.

It is the novelty in Taylor's investigations that he finds Plato and Aristophanes in profound agreement on the facts of Socrates' teaching and pursuits, however different in their method and intention. Thus the "Apology" and "Phædo," in regard to the former of which Döring says that it cannot be said to have the character of a historical document, are, according to Taylor, confirmed as historical by the indications to be found in the "Clouds." And, if we do not, and I don't think we do, misapprehend him, the Socrates of the Platonic Dialogues generally, the Socrates who argues for the transcendental reality, and not a mere conceptual reality of the Ideas, the Absolute Idealist, is none other than the Socrates who married Xanthippe and drank the hemlock. Mr. Taylor writes as follows:—"Either the Platonic dialogues faithfully preserved the genuine tradition about the person and doctrine of Socrates or the tradition has not been preserved at all, and we have no material whatever for the reconstitution of the most influential personality in the history of Greek thought except the burlesque of the 'Clouds,' and Socrates must take his place by the side of Pythagoras as one of the great unknown of history." This is nothing less than a revolution in the prevailing view of the matter, and if we may presume to offer an opinion, much more proof will have to be forthcoming than Professor Taylor has so far furnished, ere we can accept it.

Nor, while admiring his skill and ingenuity, are we convinced when, out of the "Clouds" of Aristophanes, he presents us with a Socrates who is the head of a little Pythagorean community, that leads an ascetic life, eats at a common table, studies abstruse mathematics and physics, and cherishes a mystic religion. Socrates was condemned as a heretic and innovator in religion, who paid no respect to the gods worshipped by the city, and introduced strange gods of his own. This has generally been believed to refer to the Daimonion, which Socrates claimed to possess, a Spirit within which counselled him in the critical junctures of his life. Professor Taylor rejects this view, and holds that it was his membership of this little mystical Pythagorean community—a religio illicita in Athens—which drew upon him the distrust and odium of his fellow citizens.

But does not this suggestion involve, with the asceticism it attributes to Socrates, not only the rejection of Xenophon's "Banquet" and "Memorabilia," but also of Plato's "Symposium," as justified by the character of Socrates? Socrates attained complete mastery over the appetites and passions, he was capable of extraordinary endurance and self-denial; but the gist of the evidence seems to show clearly that he was not, in the active pedagogic years of his life, an ascetic in the ordinary sense of the word. If he was, then Xenophon's camera and some of Plato's films were hopelessly bad at their work; unless, of course, he was like the divine who, when asked by a gloomy evangelical if he were a serious Christian, replied, "No,

I am a jocose one." Banquets are hardly a fit place for any but jolly ascetics. Diogenes Laertius relates that he said of Antisthenes, the head and front of the ascetic tribe, that "he could see Antisthenes' pride through the holes in his coat." Socrates did not believe in rags for the sake of rags, and the casual reader of Xenophon knows that he believed in hunger partly for the sake of appetite.

Döring holds with pretty good reason, I think, that Socrates believed in cutting down bodily wants that he might be able to live independently and choose his friends and divine pursuits freely; he wanted to be above the restraint of what Bernard Shaw calls the greatest need of man, viz., money, and he succeeded. If he had been sold up lock, stock, and barrel, he would have fetched on an estimate of his own £24 odd. His motive, like Thoreau's, was independence and liberty. But accepting this theory of it, we must regard parts of the "Phædo" as Plato's own rather than Socrates' views, and that is contrary to Professor Taylor's position; for, of course, in the "Phædo" soul and body are terms of an essential idealism. They flourish in inverse ratio one to the other.

The Higher Criticism of Socrates and of his teaching has not brought us to clear definition of the man, and especially of his message, any more than the Higher Criticism of the Gospels has yet placed Jesus and his teaching beyond the range of interesting dispute. But through it all, in both cases, we believe there is something there to dispute, and something worth dispute—without end.

R. NICOL CROSS.

TOLSTOY.

Tolstoy. By Romain Rolland. Translated by Bernard Miall. T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.
The Religion and Ethics of Tolstoy. By the Rev. Alexander Craufurd, M.A. T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.

MONSIEUR ROLLAND in his Preface tells how a common love of Tolstoy united a number of scholars of the Normal College in Paris, widely divergent in opinions, and each attracted to him for different reasons, but all finding in him a revelation of life. This is an example of the way in which the great Russian roused interest and enthusiasm among active minds and hearts in every civilised land, imperfect as the translations were in which he was presented to them.

In his book on Tolstoy, Monsieur Rolland carries us to the heart of his subject; he is not merely critical, though not uncritical in his appreciation. In small compass he gives us a great deal of Tolstoy. He is much less diffuse than his master, and quotes him wisely and well, bringing out the depths of his meaning rather than the doubtful points of his consistency.

The crisis in Tolstoy's career when, past fifty years of age, he found a religious meaning in life which delivered him from the haunting impulse to suicide, was not a sudden change into a new world of ideas and purposes; it was a concentration of many influences which had been in him for many years, whose connection and unity were now revealed and were for the time being centred round the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount. The vivid pictures given in "Sevastopol" contain more than a germ of his later teaching of the evils of war, leading to his doctrine of non-resistance; and, even earlier, at 24 years of age, he wrote in "The Invasion":—"Is it impossible, then, for men to live in peace, in this world so full of beauty, under this immeasurable starry sky? How is it they are able, here, to retain their feelings of hostility and vengeance, and the lust of destroying their fellows?" Levin, in "Anna Karenina," is a revelation of Tolstoy's own feelings, his love of nature, his sympathy with the peasants, his delight in hard work in the fields in their company, and his sense of the healthy beneficence of physical labour.

The later Tolstoy is thus a true and sincere development of the earlier Tolstoy. Always impulsive, always sincere and truthful, his unsystematised feelings are powerfully expressed in his earlier works, together with his keen insight into character and motive. The later Tolstoy has not co-ordinated all into a theory or scheme of action by intellectual effort, but has found a satisfying unity in his religious life; and therefore expresses that, and the contradictions of circumstance to its actual realisation. As Monsieur Rolland writes, "In him life and art are one." "With Tolstoy theory and creation are always hand in hand, like faith and action." He must express what he feels in some form of art, and his unflinching revelation of himself is without parallel in literature. The exaggeration of his own evil deeds is a true representation of his feeling about them, with the desire that nothing shall be hid.

Tolstoy's great influence is due to his utter truthfulness of intention. Not only in art must his conception of reality find expression, but also in life: his art must be one with life; and his life and art one with his conviction of truth, so far as he can make them. "When I come to understand a matter on which I have reflected, I cannot do otherwise than as I have understood." So these are revelations to his burning soul, and his efforts are unceasing to make his life accord with them. Monsieur Rolland substantiates his claim that Tolstoy's literary and artistic power was greater and more concentrated after his "conversion" than before, by reference to "Resurrection," the popular tales, and a number of stories now being published. It appears that the art-impulse resulted in a large number of works which were not issued in the author's lifetime.

In the chapter named "Art and Conscience," he gives with effective brevity the record of the long thirty years' domestic conflict of the great soul, bound by love and duty to those who were antagonistic to the principles which were the light and warmth of his life, and who were opposed to the way of life which was for him the only way of truth. Take, for example, these extracts from the letters of Countess Tolstoy: "He is wasting his energies in foolishness. I cannot conceal my impatience," when her husband was studying Hebrew to get to understand the Bible thoroughly. "It can only sadden me that such intellectual energies should spend themselves in chopping wood, heating the samovar, and cobbling boots." And this from Tolstoy himself to his wife: "Do not be vexed, as you so often are when I mention God; I cannot help it, for He is the very basis of my thought."

Mr. Craufurd's book is a more critical discussion of Tolstoy's Ethics and Religion, with interesting expressions of the author's own opinions on subjects suggested by Tolstoy, full of comparison and contrast with other great teachers. In so vast a field of criticism of many men and many subjects we remain in the realm of opinion, and do not get taken into communion with Tolstoy or anyone else. We are apt to dislike negative criticism when the grounds of it are not stated as in the reference "to the insecure optimism of Emerson." But the discussions are thoughtful and suggestive.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE concluding part of Sir George Trevelyan's "American Revolution" will be published next week by Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co., under the title of "George the Third and Charles Fox." The same publishers also announce "Civilisation at the Cross Roads," the Noble Lectures, delivered at Harvard University in 1911, by Dr. J. N. Figgis, and a translation of Johannes Joergensen's biography of Saint Francis of Assisi, by Mr. T. O'Connor Sloane.

* * *

A NEW "Life of Saint Patrick," by the Abbé Riguët, is announced for publication early in February by Messrs. Duckworth. The volume is included in the new series of "Lives of the Saints."

* * *

QUITE apart from the political controversies of the hour, it will be of interest to many to hear that a "Home Rule Edition" of Mr. Bernard Shaw's "John Bull's Other Island" has been published in Constable's sixpenny series. The "Preface to Politicians" is reprinted with the play, but a new preface is added, written in Bernard Shaw's characteristically vigorous and challenging style.

* * *

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & Co. make the interesting announcement that they are publishing a centenary edition of Browning's poems in ten volumes, with bibliographical and other notices from the pen of Dr. F. G. Kenyon, who edited, in collaboration with Mr. Augustine Birrell, the familiar two-volume edition of Browning. The new edition will be a limited one, and the volumes will be sold in sets only. The poems will be arranged in chronological order, and several portraits of Browning, which have not previously appeared, will be included as frontispieces.

A GILBERT WHITE EXHIBITION, consisting of relics and manuscripts belonging to the writer of the "Natural History of Selborne," is being arranged, and will be open to members of the Selborne Society on February 16, and to the public on the following day. There have been many editions of the famous "Natural History," but certainly one of the most delightful is that published by Mr. John Lane, edited by Grant Allen, and illustrated by Mr. Edmund H. New.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER.

II.

LONDON in Chaucer's time was not a bit like what it is now. The houses were pointed in front—more like some of the foreign towns, and between them here and there one would see gardens and green fields. It was easy to get out into the country, and Chaucer tells us how he used to like to get up quite early in the morning and go into the fields to see the daisies open. (He was always very fond of daisies, and has written beautiful things about them.) On the first of May, everyone used to get up very early to gather hawthorn and laurel to put in all the doorways of the streets to welcome the spring. That was a very pretty custom, and I wish we had it now, only London is such a big place that people can't get out into the country and back again in an hour or two. It was not nearly such a noisy place then, either, as there were no cabs or carriages, and only a cart passed now and then. People had to walk unless they were rich enough to ride, or if they lived near the river they used to go in boats on the Thames to and from their houses.

Well, Chaucer lived a very busy life in London for a good many years, and now and then the king sent him abroad, to Italy and France, to arrange things with the Courts there. It needed a wise and clever man to do this, and these journeys show us how much the king trusted Chaucer. When the king died, things began to go worse with Chaucer. The king's son was a little boy too young to reign, so his three uncles governed the country for him. John of Gaunt was one of these uncles, and the people did not like him, so when his back was turned (for he had to take an army into Portugal) they began to find fault with everything he had done.

There was a kind of Court of Justice held, and among the things it decided was this :—Chaucer was to be turned out of his business in the Customs' Office, because they declared he had neglected his work. It is not likely that he had, but, you see, because he was a friend of John of Gaunt, they were ready to believe any harm of him. Losing his work in this way made Chaucer very poor, and he must have gone through real hardships in this last part of his life. But he never lost his courage, he stayed true to his old friends, and it was at this time that he wrote his best poems, called the "Canterbury Tales." This shows us what a brave and patient man he must have been, and that he was able to forgive his enemies—one of the hardest things to do. No one with angry thoughts in his heart could have written about the birds in the medlar trees, and the soft rain on "the small sweet grass," and "the lily on her stalk green," as Chaucer has done. Just a year before he died the new King, Henry VI., came to the throne, and he tried to help Chaucer because he had been his father's old friend, and because he himself was fond of him. So Henry gave him £26 13s. 4d. a year, which made Chaucer no longer a poor man, but he only lived a year after Henry came to the throne. When he died he was buried in Westminster Abbey, and if you ever go there you can see the place.

Before we stop, I will try just to tell you a little about the "Canterbury Tales"—the best of Chaucer's poems. It is a great thing that we have them, because as well as the beautiful stories in them they tell us so much about all the different kinds of people who lived in England then. In those days, when people wanted to do what they thought would please God, they used to leave their homes, and go on pilgrimages—that is to say, they would go and pray to some good man who was dead (called a saint), at the church where either he was buried or which was called after him. At Canterbury the saint to whom people prayed was Thomas à Becket. He had been Archbishop of Canterbury, and was murdered by servants of King Henry II. in 1170. He was good to the poor people, and they were fond of him, so after his death the Pope made him a saint, and people used to travel from all parts of England to pray to him in his own cathedral. At the beginning of the "Canterbury Tales," Chaucer tells us how a number of people met together at the Tabard Inn, in Southwark, to sleep there on their way to Canterbury, and how the landlord of the inn put it into their heads to tell each other tales as they rode along the next day, so that the road should seem shorter. "For," said he, "it is small fun riding along as dumb as a stone." These tales were told in very different English from what we speak now, and it was also very different from the English which Cædmon spoke. You remember that I told you that this was Anglo-Saxon, but in Chaucer's time there had come a great change in the language, because of the Norman conquest, so that we had got a great many French words mixed up with the Anglo-Saxon. Chaucer's poetry sounds much prettier if you read it in the old-fashioned English, and if the words look so queerly spelt that you don't know what they mean, you have only to say them out loud to yourselves, and the sound will generally tell you. People then had more time than we have nowadays, and evidently they did not hurry so much over their speaking.

The first person that Chaucer describes among the pilgrims is a Knight. The next is a Squire, who attended on him. Then comes a Yeoman, and you know we have yeomen still, though not dressed quite as Chaucer's yeoman was, like Robin Hood. Then there was a Prioress, or nun, called Madame Eglantine, and a Monk, at whom Chaucer has a joke, for you remember I told you that he was never fond of the friars. A Friar was there too, a hypocrite, like those that Chaucer hated. After him came a Merchant, a rich man, and then a poor Scholar from Oxford. A Sergeant of Law came next—a very busy man; and after him a Franklin, a sort of rich country gentleman. Then there was a Doctor of Physic, a Shipman, a Carpenter, a Haberdasher, a Webber and a Dyer, and a "worthy woman" called the Wife of Bath, because she lived near Bath. She thought a great deal of herself, and had plenty of money, as one could see by her gay dress. She had had five husbands, and they had all died because she scolded and talked so much. Then there was a Country Parson, a good man, whom Chaucer does not mock at as he does at the friars, because he really tried to do his best, and to take care of all the poor and sick people in his parish. And there was a Ploughman also, a good, honest man; a Summoner, a man whose business it was to summon or call people before the Court of Justice, and he was bad and deceitful; and a Pardoner, who was his friend and rode alongside of him. The host of the inn and Chaucer himself are the two last whom he describes; the host was very jolly and merry, and made them all laugh with his jokes. Next day they all set off at daybreak and rode to a place where they drew lots who was to tell the first story. These stories all show how Chaucer loved to notice the things around him—the spring time, the birds, the daisies, and the brave and faithful deeds of the men and women he knew. They show that he was just as religious a poet as Cædmon, though in a different way. Being religious, you know, does not mean only going to church and singing hymns, it means being kind and good, and loving God and your neighbour. Cædmon sang about things you might think more religious than Chaucer's tales, as they had to do with what we are taught in the Bible, and Chaucer's poetry had only to do with the common things we see all round us every day in the world. But God has made the world and all the common things in it, and has given us eyes that we may see how beautiful it all is. Chaucer saw this, and he loved the beautiful things in the world so much that he makes us love them better than before when we read his poetry, and so we are more grateful to God for the world He has put us into. And when you remember how good and patient Chaucer was when he became so poor and had to go through hardships in his old age, you will see that he must have loved God and his neighbour not to write angry and hard things about them. He was too much taken up with all the beautiful things round him in the world to have an angry heart. It is a great thing to be a good man, and do one's duty, in spite of what happens to oneself, but it is better still if as well as being good one can keep a kind and merry heart, and this was what Chaucer had. That is why I want you to think of him by the verse which I have put at the beginning of this article:—

"For Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through Thy works, and I will rejoice in giving praise for the operations (i.e. works) of Thy hands."

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

Annual Business Meeting and Welcome Soirée.

THE annual business meeting of the college was held in the Memorial Hall, Albert-square, Manchester, on Wednesday, January 31, at 4.30 p.m., the President, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence in the chair. The business was quite straightforward. There were no burning questions, and but few comments. The annual report of the committee was read, the treasurer's statement was presented, and the Rev. Charles Peach gave a most interesting final report of the Jubilee Memorial Fund. These were adopted for printing and circulation. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence was re-elected President, and the officers and committee were also re-elected.

The annual report justly describes the year 1911 as "one of the most eventful in the history of the College." The Tutor, the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., passed away; the Principal retired after twenty-one years' service, and the Matron relinquished her post, which she had held since the Residence was first opened. These losses were keenly felt, but new appointments were made, and there is every confidence that past traditions will be maintained under the new order. The Rev. S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., accepted the office of Principal, and the Rev. H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D., became Resident Tutor and Warden, Mrs. McLachlan taking the post of Matron. The election of Dr. Mellone to the Principalship made it necessary for him to resign his post of Visitor, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., kindly consented to fill this place. "For the first time in its history," the report tells us, "the College now has one of its own alumni on its tutorial staff, and both visitorships filled from the same source." It is further noted in the report that Principal Mellone has been appointed Lecturer on "The History of Christian Doctrine" at the University of Manchester. During the session, 1910-11, there were ten students of the College in residence. The number for the present session is eight, two students having completed their course and entered the ministry. There were three applications received for admission to the College, but two were declined, and one has been withdrawn with a view to fuller preparation. Another matter of interest mentioned in the report is the establishment of a new scholarship and the reconstitution of an existing one. Miss Emily Sharpe has generously founded a scholarship of the annual value of £110, for Hungarian students, and the trust for the Tate Scholarship has been transferred to the College, and by the generous consideration of the trustees will now be able to be increased from 65 guineas to £70 per annum.

The report read by Mr. Peach of the Jubilee Memorial Fund was a fine record of a fine achievement. Summerville stands now a College splendidly equipped, and taking its place in every respect worthily among the other theological colleges of this district. And not the least of its distinctions is that it is a memorial of the affection and gratitude of the students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College for their alma mater. With them, the idea of Summerville originated, and with them lay the initiative in carrying it out. £20,000 were required, and the students themselves, inspired by the spirit of comradeship, raised £1,000 as their part of the total. It need not be said that this sum represents real sacrifice and devotion on their part. The enterprise thus inaugurated was carried through successfully under the leadership of Principal Gordon and Colonel Pilcher. Mr. Peach, in telling his story, might have sung "Quorum pars magna fui," but modestly left himself out. Those of us who were in the district during the campaign will know that he was one of the foremost leaders, and it is inevitable that his name should be associated with the annals of the Jubilee Fund.

In the evening, at 7 o'clock, a soirée was held to welcome Dr. and Mrs. Mellone and the Rev. H. and Mrs. McLachlan. There was a good gathering, and the chair was taken by the President, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. In his address of welcome, the President remarked that they were entering their fifty-eighth year as an institution with brighter hopes and sunnier prospects than ever before. The purchase of Summerville had been brought about by the men educated there. That was a lesson to them all to try and do something to set it joyously and prosperously on its way. Proceeding in breezy metaphors of the sea he compared the College to a ship, and heartily welcomed the new captain, Principal Mellone. He was an ideal captain. He had his heart in the work. You might get the finest man that ever was, but if he did not love his work he was but as a tinkling cymbal. They all recognised and were glad that the University had recognised Dr. Mellone's ability and repute. It was all to the good of the College. Their new Principal was blessed with a wife, and they rejoiced to welcome her also amongst them. There was another man, Mr. McLachlan.

He was flag-lieutenant, or Tutor. They looked up to him as one of their most successful students, and were grateful to him for accepting their invitation. His wife would be "stewardess." It would be a real advantage to have Mr. McLachlan living in the College as Warden and his wife as Matron, and he welcomed them both most heartily. So the College started on its new way like a ship. It was well officered. A good crew was all that was wanted. They wanted more students, and it would be their aim to turn out men who had the power as well as the wish to do their duty. In welcoming Dr. and Mrs. Mellone, and the Rev. H. and Mrs. McLachlan, they were confident that under their guidance the good ship would carry its crew safely to port.

Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., next offered a welcome on behalf of the Committee, and in doing so read letters expressing good wishes from Mr. E. C. Harding, the Rev. Philemon Moore, and the Rev. Alexander Gordon.

In his response, Dr. Mellone said that he came to the Unitarian Home Missionary College as an alumnus of the other College. Both institutions were at bottom working on the same principle. There was work for both to do, and both had, he believed, a great future. Although representing a sister College, he was none the less glad and proud to be associated with the Unitarian Home Missionary College. Both served the same cause, and had in view the same ideals. He trusted that there would be friendly sympathy and co-operation between them. He did not come to them quite as a new hand. He had been associated with the work of the College as visitor for several years. In the view of the students this office was a kind of inspectorship. The visitor had a lynx-like eye for their weak points and pet little defects, and noted them to report to the Committee. Such was the legend! During his term of office he had had some opportunity of understanding what the work was that the institution was doing. He had been impressed by the profound love and loyalty felt for the College by the old students. In this respect they were unexcelled. He had seen the place marked out for the College in Manchester, and in connection with the University, and he had felt what a great work there was to do. He, for one, had been in heartiest sympathy with the movement from the beginning. He was impressed by the enlightened policy of the University in founding a Theological Faculty on a basis scouted as an impossibility by many. It was incredible to many; yet it had been realised. Although he had not formed the ideal of being Principal of the College, he had formed the ideal of influencing and teaching young men some of the greater things on which life's real interests depend. The College served a group of churches that he was glad to give his life's work to serve. He was aware of the difficulties of their churches, and hence of the College. He was not one to be led by visionary ideals to ignore plain facts. The difficulties referred to would not grow less for a long time to come. They would have to grapple with them; hence the need of strong men who did not know what it was to be discouraged. They wanted men who would not allow circumstances to depress them. He trusted that the right men would be forthcoming. They would do their best to fit them and inspire them for their work. Concluding, Dr. Mellone expressed his great pleasure in having Mr. McLachlan as colleague, and thanked the President and friends for their kind words and wishes.

Mr. McLachlan also responded in a few words to the welcome. He found it somewhat embarrassing to reply. Dr. Mellone's case and his own were not parallel in the matter of appointment. Dr. Mellone had already justified his appointment by his published works and his power as a preacher. In his own case he had still to justify the confidence reposed in him by the Committee and officers. He would endeavour to the best of his ability to impress on the minds and hearts of the students a love of the principles they held dear. Amongst the most pleasant features of his appointment had been the number of letters of congratulation he had received from old students, and from Professors of the University. He was pleased to return to Manchester and to renew old friendships. On behalf of his wife, he promised that she would do what she could to promote the interests—physical and spiritual—of the students. Lastly, he wished to say what a pleasure he found it to co-operate with the Principal. They worked together in perfect harmony, and that was a happy augury for the future. He would be content to follow the lead of Dr. Mellone. He hoped those present would support the College and so lighten their tasks.

At intervals during the evening music, consisting of part songs and songs, was provided by Mr. Oliver H. Heys and other friends.

AIRSHIPS IN WAR.

A MEMORIAL has been drawn up, and signed by a number of well-known people protesting against the use of airships in war. The signatories say:—

"We appeal to all Governments to foster by every means in their power an international understanding which shall preserve the world from what will add a new hideousness to the present hideousness of warfare.

"Without universal agreement, no single Power can stay its hand—every day of ingenuity and every pound of money spent diminishes the chance of such agreement.

"The occasion is unique. The civilised world is now alive to the ghastliness and economic waste of war; the Hague Conference is an established fact. For the first time, in the face of a new development of the arts of fighting, nations possess both the conscience and the machinery necessary to check that development effectually.

"All civilisation protests its desire for peace and goodwill; protests its wish to reduce the already grievous burden of armaments. Unless its protestations be those of a hopeless hypocrite, it cannot stand and watch the conquest of the air, that most glorious of men's mechanical achievements, callously turned to the usages of destruction; it cannot idly acquiesce in a new departure that must heavily increase this burden of armaments.

"There are many who believe that aerial warfare, by reason of its sheer horror, must prove a blessing in disguise, frightening men from war. To those we say: Civilisation does not sanction the ravages of a new and arrestable form of disease, in order that men through horror may be the more eager to join hands in stamping out all forms of sickness. And further, you under-rate the fortitude and adaptability of human nature, which has long proved that it can endure all forms of terror.

"There are some who insist that the art of flying will never reach full development without the stimulus of war. To such we suggest that the story of mankind does not leave us without hope that where there is demand, even when only for the purposes of peaceful life, there will also be supply. If the art of flying be delayed a few years by the resolve of men to use that art for mutual help, and not for mutual destruction, the world will be no loser.

"There are many who argue that because men fight on earth and water, they may just as well fight in the air. To these we answer: There has never yet been a moment when it was practically possible to ban the war machines of earth or water. There is a moment when it is practically possible to ban those of the air. That moment is now—before the use of these machines is proved; before great vested interests have formed.

"Governments are trustees not only of the present but of the future of mankind. Fortune has placed this moment in the hands of the Governments of to-day. We pray of them to use it wisely."

Among the signatories to this memorial are the following:—Arthur H. Dyke Acland, Sir C. Thomas Dyke Acland, Dr. Walter F. Adeney, Principal Lancashire Independent College; William Archer, Professor W. J. Ashley, University of Birmingham; Professor Granville Bantock, Birmingham University; Dr. W. T. A. Barber, D.D., Head Master the Leys School, Cambridge; Sir Thomas Barclay, H. Granville Barker, Canon S. A. Barnett, Bishop of Bath and Wells, Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, W. Bramwell Booth, Professor A. C. Bradley, Oxford University; Sir John Brunner, Professor J. B. Bury, Cambridge University; George Cadbury, the Rev. R. J. Campbell, Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, Dr. John Clifford, Lord Coleridge, Sir William J. Collins, W. L. Courtney, Walter Crane, Professor T. W. Rhys Davids, William De Morgan, Sir A. Conan Doyle, Dr. James Drummond, ex-Principal Manchester College, Oxford; Sir Edward Elgar, Bishop of Ely, Sir George Frampton, R.A., John Galsworthy, the Rev. James Gow, Head Master of Westminster School; Sir H. Rider Haggard, Thomas Hardy, Frederic Harrison, Canon H. H. Henson, Dean of Hereford, Maurice Hewlett, J. A. Hobson, Dr. Robert F. Horton, Sir Victor Horsley, Selwyn Image, Professor L. P. Jacks, Manchester College, Oxford; Jerome K. Jerome, Professor William Knight, St. Andrews University; Sir Ray Lankester, Dr. J. Scott Lidgett, Bishop of Lichfield, Bishop of Lincoln, Dean of Lincoln, Lord Lister, Sir Oliver Lodge, Sidney Low, the Rev. Hon. Edward Lyttelton, Head Master of Eton; Sir Charles W. Macara, Sir John Macdonell, Professor J. W. Mackail, the Dean of Manchester, Sir William Markby, Principal J. T. Marshall, Baptist College, Manchester; John Masefield, Sir William Mather, Aylmer Maude, the Rev. F. B. Meyer, the Right Rev. John Mitchinson, Master of Pembroke College, Oxford; Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, the Rev. Professor James Hope Moulton, Professor Gilbert Murray, W. Pringle Pattison, Edinburgh University; John Lewis Paton, High Master, Manchester Grammar School; Professor Arthur S. Peake, Manchester; Dean of Peterborough, Sir Arthur Pinero, Eden Phillpotts, Professor A. F. Pollard, University of London; Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, Sir William Ramsay, Sir W. M. Ramsay, Canon H. Rashdall, Canon H. D. Rawnsley, Bishop of Rochester, Joseph Rowntree, Seeborn Rowntree, Bishop of Ross, William M. Rossetti, Sir Edward Russell, the Hon. Rollo Russell, Dean of St. Paul's, Sir John Edwin Sandys, Professor M. E. Sadler, Manchester; Bishop of Salford, John S. Sargent, R.A., the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, Bishop of Sheffield, Clement K. Shorter, Venerable Archdeacon Sinclair, Professor William Smart, University of Glasgow; Bishop of Sodor and Man, Professor Alexander Souter, University of Aberdeen; the Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, Bishop of Stepney, the Rev. William Temple, Head Master, Repton School; Professor Silvanus P. Thompson, Anthony Traill, Provost of Trinity College, Dublin; Herbert Trench, Major-General Sir Alfred Turner, Sir George Otto Trevelyan, Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, Sir William Wedderburn, H. G. Wells, Professor J. Westlake, the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, Bishop of Winchester, Forbes Winslow, Professor G. Sims Woodhead, Bishop of Woolwich, Dean of Worcester, and Israel Zangwill.

Invitations to sign were not sent to members of either House of Parliament.

ANGLO-GERMAN UNDERSTANDING.

THE campaign initiated by the National Peace Council in December last, in favour of a National and Diplomatic Understanding with Germany, has made good progress. Circular letters were addressed before Christmas to every Chamber of Commerce, Trade Council, Trade Union, and Co-operative Society, inviting support for the movement and asking for suggestions. Similar letters have been sent to members of Parliament, mayors of boroughs, and some 2,000 political organisations. Affirmative and entirely sympathetic replies have since been rapidly flowing in, those from a number of leading Chambers, including London, Edinburgh, Manchester, Bradford, Newcastle, &c., appearing in the Press on January 10.

Further replies have now been received from Chambers at Bath, Barrow, Bolton, Camborne, Cheltenham, Croydon, Dundee, Dunfermline, Glasgow, Halifax, Leicester, Newport, Torquay, Walsall, and Waterford.

The German Peace Society has commenced a similar campaign in respect of German Commercial and Trade Councils. The replies should prove equally instructive.

Similar replies of an even more hearty nature have been received from over fifty Trade Councils, and many hundreds of Labour organisations.

The Newcastle Chamber of Commerce is making its annual dinner on February 27 an Anglo-German Understanding Meeting, and Sir Frank Lascelles will then be its guest and address the leading representatives of the commercial world of North-East England.

Support has been received from a number of organisations, including the National Free Church Council, Co-operative Union, &c.

A large number of meetings have been held or are being organised both by the Council and also by the Anglo-German Friendship Society.

With a view to a frank exchange of opinions as to the causes of estrangement and the lines to be pursued to further an understanding, the Council has arranged for an Anglo-German Conference on May 14 to 15, at the Caxton Hall, when Lord Courtney of Penwith has consented to preside. It is hoped that a number of representative Germans will attend. Unofficial demonstrations, however important, cannot immediately alter the relations of the two countries, but the attitude of public opinion in this country may materially influence the views of the British Government. The aim of the Council's campaign is to crystallise public opinion in the direction of an entente with Germany.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

INTER-DENOMINATIONAL CONFERENCE OF SOCIAL SERVICE UNIONS.

A MEETING of the Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Unions, held recently at University College, Oxford, afforded gratifying proof that a real beginning of co-operation in social work has been made by the different religious bodies represented at the Conference. A pamphlet will shortly be prepared and issued setting forth the aims and present work of the various unions, with lists of their publications, syllabuses of study, and plans for future study and work. It is proposed to issue this annually, with such enlargements and alterations as may from time to time be found necessary. The first issue will have an introduction by the Bishop of Oxford, who presided at the morning session, and who has been keenly interested in the work of the Conference since its inception.

A UNITED SUMMER SCHOOL.

Perhaps the chief item in an interesting agenda was the completion of the programme of a United Summer School, which is to be held at "The Hayes," Swanwick, Derbyshire, the new hostel of the Student Christian Movement, from June 22 to 30. Nine social service unions including the National Conference Union for Social Service) are co-operating in the school, for which an admirable programme has been arranged. The sessions will be devoted half to lectures by experts on social questions, and half to questions and discussion following the lectures. The afternoons are left entirely free for social intercourse and recreation, for which the tennis courts, lawns, and orchards will afford abundant opportunity.

At the opening meeting on Saturday evening, June 22, Rev. W. Temple, headmaster of Repton, will preside, and Professor J. H. Muirhead will speak on "Problems and Prospects of Social Reform." The Bishop of Oxford will preside at a meeting on Sunday afternoon, June 23, at which the other speakers will be Canon Scott Holland, Monsignor Parkinson, and Rev. J. Scott Lidgett.

The general subject for consideration at the school proper will be "The Life of the Industrial Worker," considered under the sub-headings "The Child," "The Youth," "The Adult Worker," "The Non-Worker." The speakers are to be Mrs. Margaret Alden, Mr. C. E. B. Russell, Mr. R. A. Bray, Mr. Seebohm Rowntree, Mr. Geo. Shann, Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Mrs. Philip Gibbs, Miss Mary Simmons, Miss Towers, Mr. Will Reason, Dr. A. J. Carlyle, and others.

Each session will have as chairman a representative of one of the constituent Unions, but the lecturers have been chosen for their competence to speak on a specific subject and not as belonging to a particular religious communion. Detailed programmes are now printed, and will shortly be distributed among their members by the participating unions. Others who may not be reached in this way can obtain full information on application to Mr. J. J. Stark, Ashmead, Orleans-road, Upper Norwood, S.E. It is to be hoped that in this the first thoroughly representative combined attempt to focus the attention of the Christian churches upon the problems of present-day society, and to articulate the Christian consciousness upon them, that a large number will avail themselves of this unique opportunity of conference with social workers of most of the existing Christian communions.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Accrington: Oxford-street Unitarian Free Church.

—The annual congregational meeting in connection with the Oxford-street Church was held on Saturday, January 27, presided over by Mr. A. Webster, the newly appointed President. Reports of the various institutions connected with the church were given, all of which showed that much active work was being done. Mr. Webster referred to the loss which the church had sustained through the resignation of Mr. Bradshaw, the former President, and Councillor Cameron referred sympathetically to the continued illness of Mrs. Topping. The Rev. W. G. Topping also spoke, and after these proceedings an entertainment was given by the choir and other friends.

Bournemouth.—At the meeting of the Social Society on Wednesday evening, in the lecture hall of the West Hill-road Church, in commemoration of the Dickens Centenary, a lecture was given by the Rev. C. C. Coe, F.R.G.S., on "Pickwick." In addition to the character of Pickwick himself Mr. Coe singled out that of Sam Weller for special delineation, and by means of readings of delightful humour and dramatic force took his hearers into the very heart of the story. In the course of the lecture Russell's song, "Ivy Green," from Pickwick, was sung by Mr. Davis, a member of the church choir. The Rev. V. D. Davis, who presided, expressed at the close on behalf of those present their warm gratitude to Mr. Coe for his lecture, which they felt it a privilege to have heard; and at the same time their most cordial and affectionate congratulations on his eighty-second birthday, on the eve of which the lecture had been given. Considering the weather, which unfortunately was stormy, there was a fair attendance, and certainly a very appreciative audience.

Holywood, Co. Down: The late Mr. Omar C. Nelson.—The congregation of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church has lost a devoted member of long standing by the death of Mr. Omar C. Nelson, which took place very suddenly on February 3. Both as treasurer, and in many other ways, he had for many years rendered invaluable service to the congregation. Mr. Omar Collingwood Nelson was the youngest son of the late Rev. Samuel Craig Nelson, Unitarian minister at Downpatrick, and was born in that town on February 19, 1854, so that he had almost completed his fifty-eighth year. He was educated at Carrickmacross Grammar School, and subsequently he served his time with Messrs. Nelson & Gardner, Downpatrick, being admitted a solicitor in 1878. Shortly afterwards he took up his residence in Belfast, where thirty-two years ago he joined, as junior partner, the firm of Messrs. G. L. MacLaine & Co. A man of kindly and genial disposition, who was ever ready to lend a helping hand to every good cause, he gained the respect and confidence of all who were brought in contact with him, and those who knew him more intimately found in him a true and constant friend. One of his favourite hobbies was yachting, and he was a member of the Royal North of Ireland Yacht Club, Cultra, taking a practical interest in the management of that institution, and the day before his death he attended a meeting of the committee. Mr. Nelson married the youngest daughter of the late Mr. Wm. Pirrie, of Rockferry, Cheshire, who survives him, together with one daughter and one son.

Ilford.—The quarterly meeting of the congregation of the Unitarian Christian Church was held last week, under the presidency of Mr. E. R. Fyson, who stated that six months had now elapsed since the settlement of the Rev. A. H. Biggs among them, and as they surveyed the work of the church during that period it became evident that the experiment had been a marked success. They had added to their roll of membership; the average attendances at the morning and evening services were higher than they had ever been; the Sunday school had materially increased and was now a live institution; a guild of young people had been organised and was doing good service, notably the orchestral section of it; the Literary Society was stronger than ever; and the Women's League, with its sewing circle, rendered valuable aid. The girls' guild continued its labours on behalf of John Pound's Home, and the adult conference on Sunday afternoons had great educational possibilities before it. The whole-hearted manner in which Mr. Biggs had devoted himself to the church had won the admiration of the congregation, and his personal qualities had endeared him to them all. Reports were given by various officers and workers connected with the various institutions, and by the Secretary (Mr. A. H. Laws). Mr. J. G. Foster (Treasurer) presented the financial statement, which was of a satisfactory character, and Mr. Biggs added a few encouraging words.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—The usual monthly meeting of the Lay Preachers' Union was held at Essex Hall on January 29, 1912. The Reading Circle met at 7 p.m., and the subsequent service was conducted and the sermon preached by Mr. J. W. Gale. The Union then turned its attention to the question "What to avoid in preaching." The subject was admirably introduced by Mr. J. Kinsman, who laid special stress upon the danger of (1) affectation and self-display in the pulpit, (2) wholesale condemnation of religious convictions other than our own, (3) servile imitation even of the best models, and (4) the use of "orthodox" phraseology with mental reservations. An interesting letter from Dr. A. D. Tyssen, who was unable to be present, was read by the secretary (Mr. W. T. Colyer), who agreed generally with Mr. Kinsman, but thought it was also very desirable that the individual should try to discover and remedy any mannerisms which might prejudice his audience. Mr. E. R. Fyson and Mr. A. M. Stables respectively emphasised the evils of undue length, and of introducing personal feeling into sermons. Mr. Fyson also considered that preachers should avoid extra-Biblical readings, but Mr. Stables vigorously advocated the opposite view. The discussion closed, as usual, with words of advice from the Vice-Presidents (the Revs. W. H. Drummond and J. Arthur Pearson). Mr. Pearson especially deprecated an apologetic attitude in the pulpit, and reminded the preachers that in matters of the conduct of services and of readings, the customs and feelings of individual congregations were of first importance. Mr. Drummond, while not personally disposed to advocate the use of an extended lectionary, pointed out that if extra-Biblical readings were chosen, it was essential that the selection should be made from works of proved value, and with the greatest care. It must be remembered that the Bible had been canonized not only by the Church but also by human experience.

Manchester Circuit Church.—The congregations comprising the First Circuit Church at Manchester (Upper Brook-street, Broughton, Chorlton and Urmston) held a united service in the Broughton Church on Sunday evening, February 3. Although the weather was bitterly cold, there was a large congregation, many of whom travelled by train and tram from Urmston, Chorlton, and Brook-street. During the two years of the Circuit Church united services have been held occasionally, but this service was of an experimental nature. The Rev. Ed. W. Sealy, M.A., suggested to the Circuit Committee that instead of the "ordinary" service, with its sermon, readings, &c., a series of short addresses should be given by three laymen attached to the Circuit Church, interspersed by anthems sung by the combined choirs of the four churches. This suggestion was adopted. All present were impressed by the deeply religious spirit which prevailed, the whole-heartedness of the singing, both of the choir and congregation, and the earnestness of the speakers, Mr. Wm. Canning, Mr. Hugh V. Herford, and Mr. Henry Pilling. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Revs. E. W. Sealy, M.A., and H. E. Haycock.

Midland Sunday School Association.—The annual meeting was held at the Old Meeting School on February 3, the President, Mr. C. Johnson, in the chair. Reports on the work of the year both from the committee and visitors were read. These showed that our schools are doing a very useful work, despite the fact that several of them suffer all the disadvantages of isolation from the larger body of our workers. The treasurer's statement showed a balance in hand of £4 13s. 11d. Officers for the ensuing year were elected:—President, the Rev. T. Paxton; Vice-presidents, the Rev. G. H. Smith and Mr. C. Johnson; Treasurer, Mr. E. G. Piller; Secretary, Mr. Lewis Lloyd. The sanction of the annual meeting was obtained for completing the arrangements for three rather important pieces of work; first, the issue of a magazine giving lesson notes and a record of the work of the schools. A circulation for this of 400 copies of each issue is now promised, and lessons are being written by ministers of our district. The second work is to arrange for a plan of speakers to give addresses to schools; and the third to hold a united musical festival. During the evening an address on the work of the North Cheshire Union was given by Mr. Albert Slater, its secretary.

Northumberland and Durham Association.—As the weaker churches in this district will have to depend upon lay help, an effort is being made to form a strong Lay Preachers' Union. A meeting was held on January 15, at the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, when a programme of work was considered. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Lambelle for his kindness in acting as host. On Monday, February 5, a second meeting was held, when nineteen were present. The Rev. Alfred Hall gave an address on "Sermon Method," which was followed by questions and discussions. The meetings will be held monthly, and will be preceded by a short devotional service. Outlines of sermons will be submitted by all the members on given texts or subjects. The younger members are to accompany the older lay preachers and ministers when they supply, and will be gradually introduced to the work by taking part of the service. The members at present come from the Newcastle, Gateshead, South Shields, and Sunderland churches. The Rev. Wm. Wilson is acting as secretary pro tem.

Shrewsbury: The late Mrs. Vickery.—The High-street Church has suffered a severe loss in the death of Mrs. Hannah Rebecca Vickery, wife of Walter Vickery, J.P., which took place on February 1. Mrs. Vickery and her husband, who had been Congregationalists, became connected with the High-street Church more than 27 years ago, Mrs. Vickery being drawn by a great admiration of the personality and gospel of the late Rev. Edward Myers. Ever since she has been in every way a helper in the work of the congregation, for a time teaching in the Sunday school, and always being greatly interested in the children. Many students of the Home Missionary College remember with gratitude, and a living sense of friendship, her abounding hospitality in the house next the church. One of these old students writes, and his feelings will be shared by many present ministers: "I feel it a real privilege to have known her, and to have been allowed to enter from time to time into her home life, where I have never failed to be impressed with her gentleness and patience and sweet motherliness, often maintained under great difficulties. Her religiousness of nature also impressed me. With a keen intelligence, that always made her a most interesting companion, she combined a quiet religiousness of spirit that is all too rare, and which made one feel that she had come very near to the Great Realities." Prior to cremation the funeral service was conducted on Monday by the Rev. Joseph Wood, at Birmingham. On Tuesday a service was held in the High-street Church, which was beautifully decorated. The minister, the Rev. William Stephens, took the devotional part of the service, an address being given by the Rev. H. D. Roberts. The home, he said, was left of the helper of their joy, the guardian and good angel of the household, the loving protector and nurse of the weak; the congregation mourned the loss of the inspiration, the affection, the never-failing help and presence and example. That church was the second home of her affections, and fulfilled itself the better because she was a part of it. "I ask you to think of one who most strenuously did her best for the corner of the world she filled, who did brightly all that was in her power to serve her fellows, whose name will be numbered among those of whom this church is lovingly proud, this church into which she and hers came to find a spiritual home, and returned spiritual strength."

Stalybridge.—The resignation of the Rev. Walter Short, B.A., who has accepted the pastorate of the Bootle Free Church, has been received with deep regret by the members of the Unitarian Church. Mr. Short will leave at the end of June, when he will have completed three years at Stalybridge. The progress of the congregation during that time has been most satisfactory. On September 30, 1909, there were 203 members, whose subscriptions amounted to £73 19s., whilst for the financial year ending September 30, 1911, there were 301 members and the subscriptions amounted to £101.

Swinton.—At a social meeting held at the Unitarian Sunday School on January 27, the Rev. W. McMullin was the recipient of a presentation on his resignation of the pastorate. It consisted of a purse of money and an autograph album, with an inscription expressing the friendship and gratitude of the donors. Mr. McMullin expressed his thanks for the gift, and the sympathy and goodwill which had prompted it.

In the recent Cambridge Senior Local Examination the following pupils of Channing House School were successful:—M. Oldland obtained third-class honours; B. Lansdown, M. Walker, and I. Davies passed.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

CHARLES DICKENS AND MANCHESTER.

Mr. William E. A. Axon has contributed an interesting centenary article on "Dickens and Manchester" to the Manchester Guardian, in which he reminds us of the intimate associations which the novelist had with that town. Here his sister, Mrs. Burnett, lived, as well as his friends the Gaskells. Mrs. Burnett was the wife of an operatic singer of distinction who relinquished the stage from conscientious motives, and she and her husband suggested the characters of Nicholas Nickleby and Mrs. Nickleby, while their little deformed and precocious son was the original of Paul Dombey, and "Tiny Tim." The brothers Cheeryble were also familiar figures in Manchester when Dickens was in his prime, in the persons of Daniel and William Grant, whom Dickens immortalised in "Nicholas Nickleby."

"When Dickens first visited Manchester, in 1838," Mr. Axon tells us, "he was armed with letters of introduction from Harrison Ainsworth to Gilbert Winter, Hugh Beaver, and James Crossley, and he was accompanied by John Forster and Hablot K. Browne, better known by his artistic name of 'Phiz.' Both Dickens and Ainsworth were invited to Manchester in January, 1839, . . . Dickens' third visit was made in the interests of the Manchester Athenæum, which was in debt. The 'Great Literary Soirée' of 1843 was a device to place the finances in a better condition." It was suggested to him that at this soirée Mr. Cobden and Mr. James Crossley should be placed side by side, so that the public might have the spectacle of these violent political opponents for once ignoring their differences for the good of the Athenæum. Dickens regarded this as a splendid idea. "On the morning of the soirée Cobden heard that Disraeli was at the Mosley Arms Hotel, and the energetic Watkin [the present Sir Edward Watkin] managed to secure him for a speech. This gathering of October 5 was a great success. Dickens spoke on the need for national education—a problem still unsolved."

"The famous public readings fall into four series belonging to the years 1858-59, 1861-63, 1866-67, and 1868-70. A single night realised £300. Dickens writes: 'Such a prodigious demonstration last night in Manchester that I was obliged (contrary to my principle in such cases) to go back.' The readings were an enormous success, but they exacted from Dickens a heavy expenditure of his vital forces and in all probability shortened his life. His last reading in the Free-Trade Hall was on February 6, 1870. Poor Dolby, his indefatigable manager, writes: 'After we had passed an enjoyable and quiet Sunday in the Queen's Hotel, and as by a wonderful circumstance it did not rain, we drove to Alderley Edge, the fresh air reviving the Chief wonderfully.'"

THE SMALL HOLDINGS OF THE SEA.

If once the fisherman breed is allowed to die down, we are reminded in an extremely interesting article in the Times on the decline of the small fisheries, it can never be revived at will. "Fishermen are bred, not made; they exercise an ancient traditional craft; even ex-naval men cannot, as a rule, become proper fishermen," and modern education is making it "increasingly difficult for a fisherman's son to turn straight away from schoolroom and playground to the hardships and hazards of a fisherman's life, in face, too, of his discouraged father's advice." The small fisheries are, as a matter of fact, suffering from modern conditions which are tending to crush out many industries that were once in a vigorous and flourishing condition, and to a certain extent this is inevitable. "Unfortunately," as Mr. R. W. Crowley has remarked in his pamphlet on "State-Aid for Fishermen," "fishermen have not the organising spirit. The self-reliance that the sea breeds in them forbids that. And they have a certain pride that prevents them from airing their troubles." Then, again, to quote from the Times article, "capital, competition, and transport, together with the perishable nature of fish, have called into being a host of middlemen of the worst sort . . . Middlemen are wanted to handle the fish ashore; but there should be fewer of them, and they should work on behalf of, instead of against, the fishermen. At present they divide the fish-trade against itself."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE will be universal satisfaction at the bright hopes of a better understanding with Germany which have been created by Lord Haldane's visit to Berlin, though we are at a loss to understand why the Government should have been so careful to speak of it in terms to which the euphemism "misdescription" has been applied. In the House of Commons on Wednesday, the Prime Minister not only justified the departure from conventional methods and "full-dress" diplomatic negotiation, but was able to state that the anticipations of the good results which were likely to flow from a visit of friendship have been realised.

MR. ASQUITH had no startling disclosures to make, and had in the end to resort to the familiar appeal for patience; but anyone who will weigh his carefully chosen words will agree that the small patch of blue sky in the political heavens has suddenly grown much larger.—"There was a perfect freedom of statement," he said, "and frank explanation over a wide area of discussion. The very fact of such an interchange of views under such conditions ought in itself, we think, to dispel the suspicion, wherever it still prevails, that either Government contemplates aggressive designs against the other. I venture to say to the House, and I believe I shall find an echo in all quarters, that that in itself and by itself will be a great gain. I earnestly hope, however—I think I may go further and say that I genuinely believe—that the conversations may have more than this merely negative result." Mr. Asquith went on to speak of the "unmistakable evidence of a sincere and resolute desire upon both sides for the establishment of a better feeling." A pronouncement of this kind, spoken deliberately in the ear of the world, robs the virtue of patience of most of its difficulty.

A STARTLING proposal has been made under official sanction in Japan for the national recognition of the common elements in Shintoism, Buddhism and Christianity as a State religion. On the ground that Japan has adopted a progressive policy in politics and economics in order to share in the blessings of Western civilisation, it is urged that Christianity ought in turn to adapt itself to the national sentiments and customs, and to enter into harmonious relationship with Japanese thought and faith in the spiritual world. We are not surprised to learn that this fantastic proposal has not been able to survive even a few days of publicity. The idea of a religious amalgam of this kind has often been made the pretty plaything of an idle hour, but at the first touch of reality it is blown like dust about the world. A spiritual syncretism engineered by Government in order to increase social virtue might possibly win some measure of external obedience, but that would be the limit of its power. Life makes no terms with artificial religions.

WE think that the Bishop of Durham has been guilty of a grievous error of judgment in refusing to sanction the proposal of the Senate of Durham University to admit Nonconformists to divinity degrees on the ground that Oxford and Cambridge should lead the way. We cannot, however, agree with an Oxford correspondent in The Times that the opening of divinity degrees to all comers is more urgent than the removal of tests from professorships in the theological faculty. The conditions under which teaching and research are carried on, and the ability of a great University to select the best men for its highest posts, are more essential than any reward offered in the shape of a special degree for a period of post-graduate study. In the past the divinity degrees have been taken by very few men even in the Church of England. We believe that on the whole it is a good thing that it should be so. In theology, least of all, do we want to see the studies of the more advanced student controlled by the desire for special academic rewards, and the glittering bait of a doctor's degree held up before the eyes of men, except as an uncovenanted honour reserved for scholars of mature years who have produced work of unusual excellence and power.

THE foundation stones of the new buildings of Ruskin College, Oxford, were laid last week. The College has thus emerged triumphantly out of a period of some stress. Mr. Bowerman described it as part of a movement to win back the Universities for the workers, and emphasised the fact that while they welcomed the help and the warm democratic sympathies of many distinguished teachers of the University, they intended to keep the control of the College absolutely in their own hands as a sacred trust held by the council and executive on behalf of the Labour movement.

THE first annual dinner of the Agenda Club was held in London on Monday, Mr. Owen Seaman being in the chair. During the evening the picturesque ceremony took place of the presentation to the Club by Mr. Yamaza of a Samurai sword, to be kept as a symbol of its chivalrous aims. A good many people are watching the progress of the Club in a spirit of sympathetic detachment. It started in the race of social service severely handicapped by the vastness of its professions and its readiness to criticise the wasted energy and unscientific principles of other people. That tone was not absent from the speeches on Monday, and it requires a big record of solid achievement in order to justify it. In its endeavour to develop and extend the freemasonry of social service and its appeal to "a new spirit of chivalry and patriotism in an age of indifference" the Club will have the earnest sympathy of all social workers, but those who have been hard at work for many years, and are conscious that they have helped to do something, can hardly be accused of hyper-criticism if they ask not for more speeches but for a report of something accomplished, something done.

THE death of Lord Lister, which took place on Sunday, in his 85th year, has helped to reveal to the public a personality who was known chiefly by his works. It has been said that by his discoveries he has already helped to save more lives than were destroyed by all the wars of the last century. It is his noblest epitaph. Through him, if measured by the vast benefit of his work, the greatest of them all, suffering humanity once again becomes conscious of its inexhaustible debt to those who do battle with disease and try to lessen the sum of human pain. The writer of the obituary notice in the Manchester Guardian was happily inspired to quote W. E. Henley's description of him:—

His brow spreads large and placid, and his eye
Is deep and bright with steady looks that still;
Soft lines of tranquil thought his face fulfil—
His face at once benign, and proud, and shy.

Others will remember the scene in the Philharmonic Hall in Liverpool when, as President of the British Association, he told the unvarnished tale of his great discoveries. It had in it all the thrill and fascination of romance.

It is with deep regret and the sense of the disappearance of a great and impressive figure from the world of religious affairs that we have to record the death of Père Hyacinthe. A special memoir appears in our present issue. Here we would pay our deep and respectful tribute to the breadth of his sympathies, the largeness of his charity, and the sunshine of a confident faith in the Divine love and goodness, which remained undimmed through all the storms and disillusionments of a long life. He retained some of the austere simplicity of his Catholic vows to the end, and likened the plain room in his son's house in which he worked and slept to the cell of a monk. The present writer is never likely to forget the quiet friendliness of his welcome last autumn, the earnest tones in which he spoke of his own religious convictions, his alertness of mind to the difficulties of faith in the modern world, and then the final words, which remain like a benediction—"But we must never lose hope."

DR. FAIRBAIRN has passed away after a life crowded with amazing labours. The tributes which have appeared in the press show how deeply he was honoured and loved. Even more than his books Mansfield College and its secure renown remain as his memorial. It is too soon to attempt any estimate of his future fame as a theologian, and we think that the impulsive judgments which place him among the few conspicuous thinkers of the nineteenth century will require a good deal of revision. He had vast stores of learning and great dialectical skill; but encyclopædic knowledge is seldom compatible with deep powers of thought, which require leisure and long periods of brooding meditation in contact with the simple elements of experience for their exercise. Many readers of Dr. Fairbairn's books are more impressed by their solid learning and the clever marshalling of theological arguments than by the freshness of their religious insight. But in this he probably did himself some injustice. He could lay aside the passion for knowledge and the cramping influence of an academic atmosphere, and in the village kirk among his own people speak heart to heart of the deep things of God. It is to such moments that theology owes all its vitality.

* * *

DR. FAIRBAIRN came to Oxford in 1886 to build up the fabric of Mansfield College, to which the endowments of the Spring Hill College, Birmingham, were transferred. The beautiful buildings, of which he watched the rise with so much interest, proved that Evangelical Nonconformity was not indifferent to graces of collegiate architecture; while the skill with which he surrounded himself with a group of able young tutors trained in the best methods of Oxford study, whose pupils soon began to win distinction in the schools, showed special appreciation of the best methods of securing University interest and respect. He formed intimate friendships with the leaders of very different schools of thought, and through the College pulpit secured the aid of the most distinguished preachers of the various Free Churches, who were welcomed by large undergraduate congregations. In the general broadening of theological studies, in spreading wider views of the history of religion, and enlarging the scope of academic programmes, Dr. Fairbairn took an active share. He understood and enjoyed the University life, and the place which his eminent gifts claimed for him was freely conceded to his representative character, his remarkable administrative ability, his immense range of attainment, and his strenuous faith.

PÈRE HYACINTHE.

THE death of the Abbé Charles Loyson, enshrined for ever in the love and reverence of all who cherish truth and freedom as Père Hyacinthe, has snapped the last visible link with a past which has already become both temporally and spiritually remote. What an effort of imagination is required to think ourselves back into that ferment of religious thought and hope which in the bosom of the Catholic Church preceded, perhaps more than anything else provoked, the Decrees of 1870! We recall the great and honoured names of Strossmayer and Dollinger. We remember, above all, the Liberal movement which in the mid-century enlisted the sympathy of religious Europe for the Church of France, the movement which, in its later phases, was illustrated by the names of Montalembert and Gratry. But we remember the dishonoured collapse of that movement. We have heard since then Renan's slighting judgment of Gratry. We have learned how Montalembert himself was forced to accuse the Liberal Catholics of France of a betrayal of their trust at the time of the Vatican Council. All the fair hopes of a renewed Catholicism which had for a brief moment illumined the sky of Catholic Europe proved, after all, to be but the twilight radiance which heralded the sombre and hopeless gloom of approaching night.

Of all these representatives of the Catholic Liberalism of the middle nineteenth century Père Hyacinthe alone remained obstinately true to the vision which had inspired it. Perhaps it would be still more true to say that he alone had ever seen the vision in all the breadth and clearness of its religious hope. For the others that vision had been distorted by the ecclesiastical glasses through which they saw it. It would be as unjust as it would be ungenerous to deny to the movement as a whole a deeply religious interest and motive. Its leaders dreamed of a religion which, while loyal to the vital tradition of Catholicism, and just because of that loyalty, might be equal to the demands, whether intellectual, political, or social, of a new order. But they feared to disturb the ecclesiastical tradition with which the vital religious tradition had been associated. They failed to recognise the fact that in the complete identification of the religious and ecclesiastical traditions it was the former that was bound to suffer from the inevitable heightening of the latter's pretensions. The development of ecclesiasticism, victoriously affirmed in the Vatican Decrees, was the self-prepared defeat of a Liberalism which had not the courage to be frankly religious, and to cut itself entirely loose from the entanglements of ecclesiastical politics.

This is what Père Hyacinthe did. It may have been a tragedy that he was left to do it alone. But the tragedy was for Catholicism, as represented by the Roman Church, not for him. It is not without its significance that his real breach with the Church dates from that September 20, in the year 1869, when he left the Carmelite Order. The Catholicism in which already for many years his free spirit had increasingly found its home was not the Catholicism which was preparing a new instrument of intellectual despotism for religion. He already believed in a Catholicism in which the whole religious life of Europe might be ultimately reconciled. For the sake of that Catholicism, and for its sake alone, he was ready to resist to the death the Ultramontanism of the victorious Vatican party. Others might oppose Vaticanism in the interests of the petty vestiges of episcopal independence which still remained. It was a larger hope and a nobler aim which inspired his opposition. Even when, under the comparatively mild and tolerant rule of Leo XIII., who seemed anxious to rob the Vatican Decrees as far as possible of their sting, that Pontiff offered, through the intermediary of him who is to-day Cardinal Vivès of Tuto, to recognise Père Hyacinthe's marriage if only he would in turn recognise the doctrine of Papal infallibility, he did not hesitate to refuse the tempting bait. Not even all the ecclesiastical compromises of the most diplomatic of Popes could restore to the Roman Church that power of religious leadership which, in the late sixties, the Abbé Loyson still hoped she might prove herself to possess, but which she had deliberately abdicated once and for all in 1870.

And to the end Loyson remained magnificently true to his dream of a real religious Catholicism. He expressed the desire that if he died in Geneva (where of late years he had most of his time resided) the religious rites at his funeral might be celebrated in the cathedral church of St. Peter. "I venture," he wrote, "to ask this favour of the authorities of the Protestant Church, for which the experience of a long life has only served to deepen my sympathy and respect. I desire that representatives of the different religions existing in this city, beginning with my old and cherished colleagues of the national Catholic Church, should take part in the funeral ceremony in their ecclesiastical costume. And I specially ask the same favour of the Grand Rabbi. I wish to live and die, as far as in me lies, in the communion of all the Christian Churches, nay, in deepest communion with the universal Church of Mankind, and of the spiritual worlds beyond mankind." It matters little that it was not, after all, in his beloved Geneva that he died, but in Paris, in the home of his devoted and chivalrous son; that it was not in the Cathedral of Geneva, but in the Oratory of the Rue St. Honoré, the Protestant Cathedral of Paris, that the last Christian rites were celebrated for this martyr of a Catholicism which is hardly struggling into life. What does matter is that his whole life was a consistent witness to the reality and the imperative religious need for this age of such a Catholicism. His witness had all the religious simplicity of the ancient Hebrew prophets. He could not endure a false or a compromising situation. When, in 1873, the Canton of Geneva expelled Mgr. Mermillod, its Catholic Bishop, and offered the succession to M. Loyson, he immediately accepted it as "Curé" of the National Catholic Church. But little more than a year afterwards he resigned his position, convinced, as he declared, by a sufficiently long experience, that that Church was neither liberal in politics nor Catholic in religion. And if his religious witness was as single-eyed as that of the Hebrew prophets, it knew also, like them, how to turn to account the imaginative appeal of an accordant symbolism. It was but the natural "geste" of his truly Catholic spirit when he asked to be visited on his death-bed by Greek and Armenian priests, and the Protestant pastor Charles Wagner. The fulfilment of that desire was the sacrament of reconciliation which comforted and blessed his parting spirit. And his Catholicism, which had thus learned through a long life to transcend every sectarianism, flashed out with authentic confidence in his last conscious words: "I can appear before God; I am in peace with my conscience and my reason."

It is impossible to overrate the significance of Père Hyacinthe's marriage in and for his religious life. Even among Protestants the marriage of a Catholic priest is sometimes viewed with suspicion and instinctive dislike. For the Catholic laity a long hereditary sentiment has made it the one unpardonable offence. But that it is not so regarded by the best and most thoughtful members of the Catholic priesthood, that the revolt against clerical celibacy is increasing in volume and intensity with the enlargement and deepening of the moral sentiment, we have recently been made aware by the campaign so ably conducted by the directors of the Battaglie d'Oggi. But we have hardly yet begun to realise how largely the demand for the liberty of clerical marriage dominated the Liberal Catholicism of the middle of the last century. It may, indeed, have been the knowledge of the existence of this demand that contributed most to strengthen the hands of the Ultramontanes in 1870. For there is nothing of which the "black Internationalism" is more afraid, perhaps more justly afraid, than of a clergy bound by the closest and most familiar ties to the particular national life. At any rate, in this, as in all else, M. Loyson was the idealist who could not shrink when occasion arose from honouring his ideal in practice. What his ideal of the married state was may be learned from the last public address, so far as I know, he ever uttered, an address delivered before the "Union des Libres Penseurs et Libres Croyants" on December 3, 1911, on "The Crisis of Marriage." That noble and passionate defence of Christian marriage is, no doubt, all the more convincing that it was inspired by the actual experience of a union which had deepened and enlarged all that was best in the two partners to it during thirty-six years of storm and stress without, but of growing peace and completeness within. Père Hyacinthe at least had the right to proclaim his faith in le couple sacerdotal. "A man is a man, a woman a woman, intellectually, effectively, morally, only when they have become united in that noble and magnificent synthesis, the couple." For him that union, if it was real at all, was indissoluble in time and into eternity. But if actual experience had deepened and intensified this conception of marriage, it was none the less the conception which determined his union with Mrs. Merriman in 1873, and which then led him to obtain solemn, if informal, benediction upon it at the hands of his friend, Mgr. Passavatti, the titular Bishop of Iconium, as both Père Hyacinthe himself and the Comtesse de Fallois de Saint-Germain have recently told us. To the last he thrilled with a sublime emotion as he recalled the words which the Bishop had pronounced over himself and the companion of all his after life, as they knelt before him in that spring evening of 1873 in a house in the Via Rasella in Rome: Conjungat vos Deus in charitate in perpetuum! He knew by the event that the Church of the Eternities had uttered that blessing, unauthorised as it might be by the Church of a moment in time.

And because Charles Loyson had lived so consistently for and in the Church of the Eternities, his religious hope grew neither cold nor old. It had, indeed, a comforting and inspiring renewal in his later years. Not all the disappointments of a long life full of external religious vicissitudes sufficed to weaken his sympathy for every new effort to deepen and extend the real Catholicism of which his own life was an earnest and prophesy. He may not have hoped much from the Modernist revival in the Roman Church. Yet it did not appeal to him in vain; and in proportion as it became less academic and committed itself to a more popular and simple programme of definite religious action, it made a closer claim upon his sympathy and support. We shall not "see him any more about the world with his divine legend." But few will miss him more than that band of young enthusiasts who are fighting the battle of religious freedom and progress in the Church which he loved so well that he would not have it unequal to its divine mission, or founded less securely than on the rock-bed of conscience and reason.

AUTUMN DAYS IN AMERICA.

"I HAVE never found my imagination much excited by this or any other scene of historical celebrity," says Hawthorne in his description of the Old Manse at Concord, near the battleground, which is still pointed out to the inquisitive tourist; "nor would the placid margin of the river have lost any of its charm for me had men never fought and died there." It is a relief to be able to quote such an authority for a sentiment so heterodox, it being a tradition in Boston that everyone who visits that delightful town should be taken as soon as possible to see the place where the first blood was shed in the War of Independence, and not be allowed to return until he has read the inscriptions on houses, and boulders, and statues, and garden walls, which all tell a harrowing tale and make you shiver as you drive through the sunny streets of Arlington and Lexington. "Near this spot," we are reminded at one place, "Samuel Whittemore, then eighty years old, killed three British soldiers, April 19, 1775." A little further on we are shown the site of a house where "Jason Russell and eleven others were captured, disarmed, and killed by the retreating British." Later on you arrive at the Munroe Tavern, "Earl Percy's headquarters and hospital, where the soldiers were freely supplied with liquor," and so it goes on until you reach the old, narrow bridge over the Concord, "anciently called Musketaquid, or Grass-ground river," and gaze upon the spot

"Where once the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard round the world."

And all the time you cannot get it out of your head that these things matter little now; that it is not even quite so thrilling as you thought it would be to find yourself on hallowed ground once trodden by Hawthorne, and Emerson, and dear, delightful Mr. Alcott. You yourself have a life of your own to live, and a soul to develop, and Nature is speaking to you of the present with her sweet insistent voice as you pass by shady orchards, where every tree is laden with rosy fruit, or catch through the slender stems of silver beeches, fluttering their garlands of pale autumn leaves, the ripple of sunlit water or the intenser blue of the sky.

Perhaps Walden Pond is the place where you are most conscious of the delight of old memories as you tread through the tawny bracken, and come down to the edge of that still lake in a hollow of the woods which is for ever linked with the name of Thoreau. And yet, even here, there is something in the spirit of the place which fills you with "the rapture of the forward view," rather than of the past, and makes the face of October as bright as the face of April. The greenness of the grass, wherever grass is to be seen, the splendour of the sunshine on tangles of crimson dogwood or flaming sunach, the glory of the maples in their garment of fire, the freshness of the breeze that ripples the surface of the water—all these seem less reminiscent of departed summer than prophetic of the passionate beauty of a new year. It is easy to understand how the spirit of contentment grew in the heart of Thoreau, as he breathed the fragrance of the woods that helped to clear his mind of those false notions and queer illusions which infect the brain of over-civilised men. It is easy to understand why he did not write poems in his primitive log cabin about the sadness of the "fall," or the pathos of things that must die; but, instead, of the rosebuds under the wind-piled snow, and the wood-god's mystic tale

"Of star-dust and star-pilgrimages;
Of rounded worlds, of space and time. . .
The ever old, the ever young,
And, far within these cadent pauses,
The chorus of the ancient Causes."

But, indeed, autumn treads the woods and meadows throughout New England like a splendid goddess rather than a dis-crowned queen with pensive eyes, and the trees that kindle at her coming burn like torches with a clear and unconsuming flame when her breath has touched them. In the region of the Berkshire Hills, that long range of thickly-wooded heights sloping up from green valleys that embosom many a quiet lake and peaceful river, the foliage takes on such gorgeous colours that it seems as if you are watching a world in conflagration. The maple is the glory of this beautiful country, but beeches and American oaks add their wonderful tints to the picture; and the goldenrod and wild aster make a riotous confusion of purple and yellow in the woodland clearings and ravines. Here a mountain stream, with little foam-breaks curling above its brown depths, flashes through a leafy coombe that reminds you of "glorious Devon"; there a great boulder, with trails of crimson dogwood softening its hard outline, brings back to memory the fells above Coniston or the moorlands of Cornwall in the time of purple heather. The scenery in Massachusetts is very much like English scenery in many respects. Quite un-English, however, though full of charm and homeliness, are the weather-beaten old farms and frame houses nestling among these wooded hills; the pleasant towns, with their grassy sidewalks and avenues of elms, dignified meeting-houses with slender spires pricking through the trees, and the vine-wreathed "summer homes" of Lenox and Great Barrington, surrounded by velvety lawns dotted with clumps of hydrangea that slope down to the banks of some shining "pool" or the Housatonic river.

But it is not only among the "Berkshires" that autumn achieves her loveliest effects; and although a visit to the United States barely lasting six weeks does not afford the opportunity of seeing more than a relatively small portion of this vast country, unless the whole time is spent in travelling, some delightful varieties of landscape and colour may be seen if a journey is taken to the Middle West. Here the tints are more subdued, the woods less dense, the hills fewer and less imposing, and the sense of space seizes upon the imagination as the eye travels over the wide plains of Illinois or Indiana, where great orange-coloured pumpkins are ripening amid sheaves of Indian corn. We remember, too, the idyllic beauty of certain villages in Connecticut, or lovely little riverside resorts on Long Island Sound; great bluffs clothed in tawny-coloured foliage overhanging the Niagara Gorge; sun-steeped vineyards and wheatfields on the shores of Lake Ontario; the ever-changing panorama of hill and dale, lake and forest, under a turquoise sky as we journeyed for nearly a whole day through the Mohawk Valley to Buffalo.

And then there is another autumn—the autumn of New York streets and Boston suburbs, of stately avenues and broad thoroughfares full of large "stores"—an autumn that is all blue sky and exhilarating sunshine, cheerful prosperity, and a sense of physical well-being. This is the autumn that may be most enjoyed, as you feast your eyes on the great bronze and gold chrysanthemums in a florist's shop, or drive in an automobile amidst the tarnished splendour of the trees in Central Park. It gives you radiant days and golden vistas, the intoxication of big cities and the contact of human beings, the delicious renewal of mental activities after a long and tropical summer. It gives you nights of starry beauty, of dazzling reflections in dark rivers; it gives you a keener zest for new books, new plays, new pictures, and new problems. In a word, it quickens you into fresh life and fruitful activity of mind and body, to which communion with our fellows contributes no less than the dreamful days we spend alone with Nature.

OUR PARIS LETTER.

MEMORIES OF PÈRE HYACINTHE.

THE FUNERAL SERVICE AT THE ORATOIRE.

I HAVE known Père Hyacinthe—one can never call him anything else—only during the last five years of his life, although, if I am not mistaken, we had previously exchanged one or two letters. Short as my friendship with him has been, it will remain a lasting memory.

What impressed one first of all—and the impression remained on further acquaintance—was the beauty of his character. No man was ever more pure in heart, more profoundly religious in spirit, more single-minded and sincere. He had a beautiful face, but to what extent it was physically beautiful one could hardly tell; what struck one most was the beauty of the soul that shone through it. But there was physical beauty as well in that massive head with its long white locks. Young people and children always loved him, as he loved them. He was devoted to his grandchildren, and his last word and thought were for his little grand-daughter of two years. My own daughters will never forget their first meeting with him, when we took a drive together in the Bois. It was delightful to see the old man so entirely at home with two girls in their teens.

One of his most striking characteristics was his youthfulness. Not merely was he physically active for his age, but his heart and mind remained young. In some respects, especially in regard to moral questions, he was very conservative, but he was completely tolerant, and I never met a man of his age more open to new ideas. He had, moreover, that fine courtesy which springs from genuine humility; in that respect he resembled Father Tyrrell, whom he did not at all resemble intellectually, his mind being of a different type. In politics he was an ardent, but somewhat conservative, Republican; a little afraid, as was only natural, of certain contemporary developments, but always ready to hear the other side. I often discussed political and economic questions with him, and, although my opinions must have seemed to him terribly revolutionary, I do not think that he was shocked by them. He used to say that he had not studied economic questions, and that economic evolution might well take a direction which did not seem to him to be practicable.

Naturally, conversations with Père Hyacinthe turned more often on religious and moral questions. There were, in his opinion, three fundamentals, to which he adhered uncompromisingly — God, the Future Life, and the Family. Had he been an Englishman, he would, as he often told me, have joined the Anglican Church, which, perhaps, he believed to be more liberal than it really is. But in his later years, although he would never label himself, his theological position was, in fact, that of a Unitarian, rather of the old school. He had received his theological training at St. Sulpice before the neo-scholastic reaction had ousted Cartesianism from the French theological schools, but his conception of God, for instance, was rather scholastic. Although he had immense sympathy with the "modernist" movement, and a profound admiration for Father Tyrrell, in particular, he was not a "modernist." His interest in the movement was chiefly in its possible practical results as a movement for the reform of Catholicism; what appealed to him especially in Father Tyrrell was the latter's courage and sincerity. I do not think that Père Hyacinthe would ever have assimilated the "modernist" explanations of Catholic dogma, such as that which makes Christ a symbol of the divinity of humanity. For Jesus he had a profound love and veneration, but he had come to think that the dogma of his divinity impaired the sense of the unity of God.

On the question of the family Père Hyacinthe was uncompromising. The signs which he remarked of the disruption of the family as an institution caused him profound concern. His last appearance in public, only two months before his death, was to deliver to the "Union des Libres Penseurs et Libres Croyants" an address on "La Crise du Mariage." With all his old eloquence and with a vigour marvellous in a man of eighty-four, he defended the traditional conceptions of marriage and the family, hardly admitting divorce, and then only as a desperate remedy in extreme cases.

His later years were saddened by the breakdown of religion in France and in the Latin countries generally, to which he attributed the loosening of social ties, and whose cause, in his opinion, was the final triumph of Ultramontanism in the Roman Church. He had lived to see his worst forebodings justified, and their justification was his greatest sorrow. At the end of his life he was more than ever convinced that he had been right in 1870, naturally so, since the events of the last forty years have shown that, as he anticipated, the Definition of 1870 rang the death-knell of French Catholicism. I think that he would have been glad if the events had shown him to be mistaken; but he could never have regretted that he had been true to his conscience. His life was summed up by his declaration on his death bed: "Je suis en paix avec ma conscience et ma raison."

He had never lost his love for the mother who had turned him out of doors; never did one hear from him a bitter word against the Roman Church or even against his own detractors. But it grieved him to the heart to see her becoming more and more a sect, and a political sect, estranging from her all that was best in France and losing her hold on the French people. He had known France as a Catholic country; he lived to know it as a country where the majority are outside all religious influence and where Catholicism has become to a large extent a mere political badge. What grieved him above all was the attitude of those Catholics who felt as he did about the tendencies of Ultramontanism. In the course of his long life he had seen so many movements which seemed full of promise; one after the other had been crushed, and those who had taken part in them had submitted, subscribing to dogmas in which they did not believe or taking oaths with a mental reservation. I think that it was when the "modernist" clergy, with few exceptions, took the oath of adhesion to the doctrines of the Encyclical Pascendi that Père Hyacinthe became finally convinced that there was no hope of the Roman Church. Nothing seemed to him more hopeless than a lack of sincerity, and he felt that the one thing needful is to be true to one's conscience at whatever cost.

But his faith never wavered. As Pastor Roberty said at his funeral, Père Hyacinthe "avait la passion de l'unité divine; le Dieu unique hantait son esprit." He had also a passion for human unity, and to the end of his days he retained his passionate belief in the Catholic Church of the future, which should be the Church of humanity. His funeral last Monday was typical of his wide catholicity. Almost every religious body, excepting official "Catholicism," was represented at it. The Anglican Church was represented by Bishop Ormsby, chaplain of the Embassy Church, in his episcopal habit. There were Greek, Armenian and "schismatic" Catholic priests, a Jewish Rabbi, French Protestant pastors, American Presbyterian and English Wesleyan ministers, and even Mohammedanism was represented by Abd-el-Hakim.

All France, with the one exception mentioned, joined in the last tribute of respect to the great orator of Notre Dame, who sacrificed to his conscience a brilliant ecclesiastical career. The Prime Minister sent a letter of condolence, the Minister of the Interior was officially represented at the Oratoire; and the President of the Chamber, M. Brisson, before going to his parliamentary duties, visited the house of

M. Paul Loyson to pay his last respects to an old adversary. For M. Brisson, as a young man, was a member of the staff of La Morale Indépendante, whose doctrines Père Hyacinthe combated from the pulpit of Notre Dame in the famous Advent courses, which M. Brisson regularly followed.

The sight in the Oratoire was a moving one; it was packed from floor to ceiling, and some adventurous souls were even standing on the cornice at the top of the building, unprotected by any balustrade. The street outside was filled by a huge crowd unable to obtain admission. In the centre of the church was the coffin on a simple bier, covered with a pall, on which was a bronze palm-leaf with the inscription:—"Au lutteur qui se sacrifia aux droits de la conscience, les rédacteurs des Droits de l'Homme." Round the bier were grouped representatives of art and literature, science and politics, of the University and the Collège de France.

The service was as simple as it was impressive; a prayer, a passage from the Bible, the Lord's Prayer, and three cantiques beautifully sung by the choir. One of the latter was the "Ave Verum" in Latin. The addresses were delivered by Pastors Roberty and Wagner and M. Gabriel Séailles, who spoke on behalf of the "Union des Libres Penseurs et Libres Croyants;" they will be reported in full in this week's issue of Les Droits de l'Homme. The address, in particular, of Pastor Roberty was of great beauty, penetrated with a sincere emotion which deeply moved the congregation. M. Séailles did not speak from the pulpit, and his address was, unfortunately, audible to only a few, but those who read it will find that it is a fine appreciation of Père Hyacinthe.

After the service at the Oratoire the body was cremated at Père-Lachaise, only M. and Madame Paul Loyson being present in the crematorium. Some two hundred persons, however, remained outside for about two hours, and accompanied M. Loyson when he deposited the urn containing his father's ashes in a niche in the cloister. Next week the ashes will be united in a single urn with those of the late Madame Loyson, whose death two years ago was a blow from which Père Hyacinthe never really recovered.

French Protestantism has honoured itself by giving hospitality to the principal Protestant church of Paris to the remains of the man whom, like Lamennais, Döllinger and Tyrrell, the Roman Church cast out. Henceforth the reproach of narrowness and sectarianism so often brought against French Protestantism must at least be modified. If only French Protestants as a body could be imbued with the spirit of Monday's ceremony and of Pastor Roberty's address, they might yet do much for the religion of their country, in which their high character and intellectual attainments already give them an influence out of all proportion to their small numbers.

Among the numerous senders of letters and telegrams of condolence were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Queen of Roumania, and the Mayor of Rome. The Archbishop telegraphed:—"Accept our sincere sympathy in your great bereavement. Your honoured father's call to rest brings back sacred memories of a great preacher's eloquence and a good man's faith." The Queen of Roumania telegraphed as follows:—"En participant votre douleur profonde et légitime, je vous trouve encore heureux d'avoir eu un tel père et, pour moi, cela restera un souvenir ineffaçable d'avoir entendu sa voix.—Elisabeth." The Mayor of Rome's telegram was as follows:—"Je partage votre deuil pour la perte de votre illustre père, Hyacinthe Loyson, qui, luttant contre la tyrannie du dogme, au cours de sa longue vie respectée, a travaillé pour l'émancipation et de la foi et de l'esprit humain.—Nathan."

It should be added that Père Hyacinthe's last act was to dictate to his son a letter thanking those English friends who, for thirty years, have subscribed to give him a pension.

BERGSON AND MARTINEAU.

SIR,—I rejoice to read Professor Jacks' glowing appreciation of his, and my, great teacher, and also to learn that when my friend penned his caustic references to certain moral stalwarts, it was not Martineau and his like that he had in view. M. Bergson's genius has thrown most interesting and supremely important light on biological evolution; but my impression is that even Professor Jacks will come to recognise that the genius of Martineau has been, and will be, more helpful in the treatment of moral and religious questions.

M. Bergson admirably shows that freedom (or what Martineau would prefer to call spontaneous self-action, or life) is the property of all nature, and that this freedom culminates in the self-consciousness of man. But Martineau adds, what M. Bergson denies, that self-conscious beings can at times take either of two possible moral alternatives; and because of this, and only because of this (contends Martineau) does man become capable of righteousness and of sin.

M. Bergson is compelled by his fundamental principle, that reality is ever-flowing duration, to deny the existence in man of a real, or, what the philosophers call, a noumenal self; a self that can compare and freely decide between its own motives. According to him, the soul is an ever-flowing series of psychical states, permeating each other, and forming an organic unity. Now such an organic unity as this cannot possibly be conceived as making a free choice between equally possible alternatives. Hence when Martineau and Bergson reach that point in the evolutionary process when the anthropoid ape begins to form concepts and social and moral ideas, and thus becomes human, these two eminent thinkers at once take divergent paths. When the dawning man begins, as Clifford says, to be conscious of a family-self or a tribal-self, as well as of his own private self; and when the claims of the other self are felt to collide with his own personal passions and desires, Martineau thinks that the germs of real moral freedom are present, and that if the new man takes the selfish course he is ashamed, and is also more or less aware that he could have taken the other. Martineau, accordingly, fills more than a hundred pages of his "Study of Religion" in establishing the existence in human nature of a power of free choice between higher and lower alternatives; and by this he means that in temptation it is open to the tempted soul to freely choose between gratifying its own personal cravings and surrendering itself to the claims of the moral ideal, i.e., the indwelling God.

M. Bergson, on the other hand, occupies about the same number of pages in "Time and Free-will" in proving by means of a diagram and some argumentation that the idea that we could have taken the other alternative is a delusion arising from the circumstance that our minds erroneously come to conceive of time under a spatial form. He contends, accordingly, that the notion of the existence of an alternative is reached by a process of false reasoning.

Now this is all utterly foreign to Martineau's conception of Moral Freedom. In his view Free-will rests entirely on an immediate and wholly unique intuition. As it does not come by reasoning, so it cannot be destroyed by reasoning. Things and ideas which grow are, to use Professor Jacks' metaphor, always liable to stiffen by age and to be finally broken. The Ptolemaic conception of the cosmos is supplanted by the Copernican; Dr. Martineau's social ideal appears to be giving place to a less individualistic one. But in regard to the ultimate intuitions of the soul, they are unchangeable and indestructible. You may doubt and deny their validity, as many persons at times do in the case of this intuition of free choice between moral alternatives, but disprove it you cannot; and finally get rid of it you cannot. Ere long it always crops up again, and the old controversy has as much vitality now as at any period of human history. As the great physiologist Du Bois-Reymond well says: "None but unconquerable problems are thus undying."

Why this belief in our free-will is often eclipsed it is not difficult to see. In the first place, it sometimes happens that for weeks or months together we are not clearly conscious of the deliberate exercise of this power of free choice. Again, if we study nature we can hardly fail to be impressed by the seemingly unbroken uniformity of sequence in the inorganic world. Further, we notice how often we can safely predict a person's conduct by our knowledge of his character. And if our own lives run for a good while on a pretty uniform moral level, and no higher ideal demanding self-sacrifice comes in to disturb our equanimity, we are apt to fancy that we never make serious choices between equally possible lines of action.

But as Martineau, Du Bois-Reymond, and many other philosophers have noted, there are serious practical issues and moral crises in all lives when it is hardly possible for even the most resolute Monist to resist the intuitive judgment that he and those with whom he has had to do could have acted otherwise than they actually did, and that it is just because of this that they are in a measure responsible for the upward or downward trend of their characters. If this belief had arisen, as M. Bergson says, from an intellectual error, it surely would, like all such false conclusions, have been long ago exploded, or at least relegated to the ignorant and unreflective classes. But we have seen that this is not the case; for free-will still holds its own in society, and is quite lively and aggressive on high-class philosophical literature.—Yours, &c.,

RELIGION AND PERSONALITY.

SIR,—There is no man with whom I desire conflict or controversy less than Dr. James Drummond. Spontaneously and frankly, then, I apologise if, unwittingly, I have imputed to him what he neither thought nor said. But I cannot shelter under the plea of imaginative "recollections." The incriminated sentences were written of set purpose in full cognisance of what Dr. Drummond had written, but, as I now gather, under a wrong interpretation.

As a matter of fact I was right in saying "the left wing was made to answer for the centre and right wings of religious believers." Dr. Drummond used avowedly the answer of Theodore Parker. And, when a learned theologian is combating an assertion, one imagines he will give the strongest answer possible. Nor had I neglected the words that this (Parker) "view does not appear to me adequate or satisfying." What, I respectfully urge, was the object in giving an answer that was neither "adequate nor satisfying" to the very theologian who advanced it? I could only take it to mean that Dr. Drummond considered that the very suggestion of the non-historicity of Jesus could not be entertained by himself as a living question. In that case he would not be bound to give an answer; but in that case it would be correct to add "the centre and right wings had no answer, and could not possibly have an answer ready," to a question that they considered ought not to be put at all.

Further, I think Dr. Drummond does me an injustice when he says he was not asked the question as to the possible effect of the non-historicity of Jesus upon Religion? Here are his own words:—

"In view, however, of the recent cant about the destruction of liberal Christianity, it may be of advantage for some of your readers who are not technical theologians to point out that the hypothesis which Dr. Anderson champions would, if established, be far less destructive to liberal than to orthodox Christianity."

Surely "Liberal and Orthodox" Christianity are the only words applicable to the "Religion" of Jesus, and are inclusive. There is no other kind of Christianity in the field.

The matter is so important, quite apart from my own challenged position in respect to Dr. Drummond, that I give Dr. Drummond's concluding words of December 24, 1910:—

"But the point to be emphasised at present is that the real existence and true humanity of Jesus are corner stones in the orthodox system. If there were no historical Jesus, then there was no incarnation, no crucifixion, and consequently no atonement, no saving blood, no merits, and the whole orthodox theology, whether Catholic or Protestant, becomes simply a dead mythology.

"But Liberal Christianity would not necessarily share this fate. Not one form which it has assumed represents the essence of Christianity as consisting of the truths which Jesus taught. This was expressed long ago by Theodore Parker in the startling words that, if Christianity were true at all it would be just as true if Herod or Catiline had taught it. This statement clearly implies that Christianity is a system of spiritual truth which, when once the world has acquired it, is wholly independent of its historical origin. This view does not appear to me adequate or satisfying, but it has been held by earnest and thoughtful liberal Christians, and would remain unimpaired if the whole of primitive Christianity could be resolved into Oriental myth. Of course, the orthodox also could retain this valuable portion of Christianity; but the orthodox system would have become a heap of archæological ruins."

My contention is that, if "there was no historical Jesus," then Christianity as the "Religion of a Person" also disastrously becomes "a heap of archæological ruins." The only possible point at issue is whether Dr. Drummond's argument regarding "orthodox" Christianity is or is not as valid against that form of "Liberal" Christianity that counts its Christianity as inseparable from a "Person." I consider that it is: and I confess that in my judgment "if there was no historical Jesus," the only argument for Christianity is the intrinsic worth of the principles inculcated under its name. It is open to Dr. Drummond to demonstrate the weakness of my contention; and I trust, not only for my enlightenment, but for the illumination of so interesting an issue, that he will make the attempt. The only real complaint he makes against me is that I have assumed that he has no answer. I am at his mercy if he has, and, prospectively, I apologise.

Mr. Capleton insists on the principle of "Love," as I think, rightly. With his reference to Liberal Christianity "not being identified with one phase of thought" I am also in agreement. My point was, and this is the real test of the present incursion, that some Liberal Christians do tend to identify it with their own particular phase of thought, and thus narrow the basis of any possible "Free Catholic Church." If permitted, I trust to consider this subject in some subsequent number of THE INQUIRER.—Yours, &c.,

H. D. ROBERTS.

Dr. Drummond has sent the following reply to Mr. Roberts' letter:—

Let me assure Mr. Roberts that no apology is needed for a slip such as may fall to the lot of the most careful writer. I wrote in my letter not "ease of misrepresentation" (as printed), but "ease of misinterpretation." I meant to suggest that Mr. Roberts might have quite innocently misunderstood my words when he first read them, and so have retained a wrong impression in his memory. That this was actually the case his present letter seems to show, for he still understands my original communication in a sense which was never intended. My not having been asked the question is a matter of no importance if I was in fact dealing with the subject which is still in Mr. Roberts' mind. The question what would be "the possible effect upon Religion" if the mythical view were established, and the question whether the establishment of that view would destroy liberal Christianity, seem to me to be totally different, the former having a vast and serious import which is quite absent from the latter. In speaking of a "helpless" answer to the former question, I meant that it would not be informing to say that if all but the spiritual principles of Christianity were destroyed, only the spiritual principles of Christianity would remain; and I certainly never intended to make that obvious reflection. To the latter question I gave what I believe was a sufficient answer, by pointing out the fact that there had long been in existence a form of liberal Christianity which the mythical view could not touch. This answer, involving nothing but a statement of historical fact, might have been given by the Pope as well as by me, if he happened to possess the little bit of knowledge which it required. It is no answer at all to the question "as to the possible effect upon Religion," which would involve an inquiry into the nature and basis of religious belief, the method of Divine revelation, the influence of one soul upon another, and related topics. On these the passages quoted from me by Mr. Roberts have only an incidental and extremely limited bearing. If anyone cares to know my opinion on so large a range of subjects I am afraid I must be content to refer him to my books.

I hope I have succeeded in clearing away the obscurity which seems to have rested on my former words.—Yours, &c.

THE STORY OF LONDON.

East London. By G. F. Bosworth, F.R.G.S. Cambridge: At the University Press. 1s. 6d.

A TIME there was when we were most lamentably indifferent to the historical significance of London, although there was never a period when the scent of violets and roses from a flower-girl's basket in Cheapside, the wheeling flight of the gulls over Blackfriars Bridge, the glint of early crocuses under the grey tower of St.

Giles's, or the enchanted barges slowly moving along the Thames in a sombre golden haze just before twilight did not give birth to strange longings and make the heart beat faster. In rain or shine we trod the streets of the great city as if in the presence of an enchantress with power over our souls for life and death. Her beauty took us unawares as we crossed old Battersea Bridge, before Whistler's Nocturnes were as highly prized as they are now; as we saw the ghostly dome of St. Paul's lifting itself above a sea of fog on some frosty November morning, or fared into the sunset with the crowd going westward which George Meredith has described in a memorable passage. But as yet the stones under our feet were dumb, and the old towers, spires, walls, watergates, and even the banks of "silver-footed Thamasis" that once were "painted all with variable flowers," failed to stir us with memories of the past. We had scarcely become conscious of a still more familiar aspect of London—of the variety of causes which have produced its extremes of wealth and poverty, and set an impassable gulf between the world of fashion in the West End and the children of toil in the East. All that came later, and with it a realisation of the tremendous significance of the great historical pageant enacted century after century, as Mr. G. F. Bosworth reminds us anew in the brief illustrated chronicle he has contributed to the Cambridge County Geographies, within an area that has grown "from a British village of less than half a square mile, to the present size of the Metropolis.

This little volume is one of a series of handbooks to the English counties chiefly intended for use in schools. It does not pretend, to deal exhaustively with its subject, and when it is remembered that a period of 2,000 years is covered in 250 pages, it will be obvious that the writer has not been able to do much more than summarise, and that very briefly, the principal events in the history of the greatest city in the world, the reader being left to fill in details as amply as his knowledge and imagination permit. But the amount of information which is actually given about the steady growth of London, its inhabitants, architecture, trades, customs, climate, natural history, geology, antiquities, and administration is astonishing. It must be remembered that, although only the eastern portion is here dealt with, this eastern portion has an area of 41,832 acres, comprises 16 out of the 29 boroughs into which the County of London is divided, and includes what we know as "the City," which is about one square mile in extent. We have here a certain pattern laid before us, as it were, and many parti-coloured threads are put into our hands with which to weave a wonderful tapestry before the eyes of our young citizens, telling the story of heroic achievements, of patient self-denial, of honour and valour, of labour and piety, of plague, pestilence, and sudden death followed by the purging fury of the "infinite great Fire" which destroyed, along with the picturesque but insanitary houses of wood where disease still lurked, fine monasteries, palaces, mansions, and churches to the number of 89, including Old St. Paul's.

It is a stirring record, and no child whose home is in London—or in England, for the matter of that—should be allowed to grow up without some knowledge of it.

There is a passage in this book which is to us pregnant with the romance of the past, and which links up grey old London town in the mind of an irresponsible dreamer, who likes to escape sometimes from the broad high-road of historical fact, with immortal Helen and the glory of Greece and Rome. Geoffrey of Monmouth, so we are told, gives a legend of the founding of London. "This describes how Brutus came over from Troy and formed the plan of building a city. When he came to the Thames he found a site on its banks most suitable for this purpose. There he built a city calling it Troia Nova, i.e., New Troy, which was afterwards corrupted into Trinovantum." A legend—that is all, but the words "Troia Nova" have all the music and charm of Samarcand, and Ilium, and Babylon, and Persepolis. After this, as we may remind ourselves when we are next in Ludgate Hill, "King Lud built walls and towers round the city; and when he died his body was buried by the gate which is called in the Celtic speech 'Porthlud,' but in the Saxon 'Ludesgata.'" The book is one which we can recommend to Sunday school teachers and others, who are often in need of just such material as it supplies when they wish to dwell on the responsibilities of citizenship, or the great debt which we owe to the past.

THE MIND OF ST. PAUL. By L. Goudge, D.D. London: Edward Arnold. 2s. 6d. net.

IN these lectures to clergymen Dr. Goudge attempts to expound the mind of St. Paul as illustrated in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. He pleads for greater stress to be laid upon the Atonement rather than upon the Incarnation. "Back to the Cross, and to the resurrection which followed it. Our model is not the Christ of Galilee; it is the Christ of heaven." This doctrine will probably command the sympathies of Liberal religious thinkers less than Dr. Goudge's fine utterance on the Church and its ministry. "We think that if the outlook for the Church is menacing the Church must be made safe before we can do our work. We put our strength into getting ready for our work instead of putting our strength into doing it. We take no pleasure in infirmities, and so we try to remove them from the Church and from ourselves. We take no pleasure in reproaches, and so we think we must successfully defend the Church against all the charges made against her. We take no pleasure in necessities and persecutions, and distresses, and so we think that the Church must have all that she seems to require for the doing of her work—an established position, an adequate endowment, a sufficient body of trained clergy, and the command of the schools—and then we will begin in good earnest. Let us have these things if they come, and make the best use we can of them. But if God has given us our task, we must do it now, and do it as we are. The Church is always in a crisis, and always will be."

LITERARY NOTES.

THE Centenary of Robert Browning will be celebrated at Westminster Abbey on May 7, when an afternoon service will be held at which special music composed by Sir Hubert Parry will be sung to the lines from "Saul," ending with "See the Christ stand." Sir F. Bridge, the Abbey organist, will give the music to Mrs. Browning's poem, "He giveth his beloved sleep," which was sung at his grave 22 years ago. After the service an adjournment will be made to the College Hall, where the Marquis of Crewe will preside, and Bishop Boyd Carpenter will speak on "The Oral Interpretation of Browning." Canon Rawnsley will read four stanzas which he wrote lately for Browning's grave, following these by a part of "The Poet's Homecoming," which he composed after his death, on the removal of his remains to the Abbey. Papers will afterwards be read by Miss Emily Hickey, one of the founders of the Browning Society; Mr. Ernest H. Coleridge, grandson of S. T. Coleridge; Mr. H. C. Minchin, Mr. W. Kingsland, Dr. Hill, late Master of Downing College, Cambridge; and Professor Henry Laurie, from Melbourne, if he can arrive in time. Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish all these papers with an account of the Centenary Celebration, edited by Professor Knight, and a list of the 300 representative men and women from Britain, America, and the Continent of Europe, who have responded to the invitation.

"THE English Dissenters in the Light of Recent Research" is the title of a book by Mr. Chaplin Burrage, which has just been issued by the Cambridge University Press. It is a history of Nonconformists from 1450 to 1641, which claims to be, to some extent, an enlargement and completion of Dr. Martyn Dexter's "Collections towards a History of Congregationalism." The Cambridge University Press is also issuing a short account of Christian Epigraphy, dealing largely with the epitaphs written for the early Christians in Rome. It is a translation of the Italian work of Professor Orazio Marucchi.

MR. MURRAY announces that the second volume of Monsignor Duchesne's "Early History of the Christian Church" is nearly ready, and will be published during the spring season.

THE "Letters of Sarah Orne Jewett" have been collected for publication by Mrs. J. T. Fields, a friend of Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, and Holmes, the biographer of Mrs. Beecher Stowe, Whittier, and her husband, J. T. Fields, the eminent publisher. The tales and sketches of New England life and Puritan character which came from her pen won many readers for Sarah Orne Jewett, and we have recently received from Messrs. Constable, a new edition of "The Country Doctor," the story of a girl who feels that she has a vocation for the medical profession which was evidently considered more extraordinary at the time when the story was written than it is at the present day. Mrs. Fields' book will also be published by Messrs. Constable.

AN English translation of the "Memoirs of Francesco Crispi" is about to be published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. The time has come when much that has been suppressed in connection with the part played by Crispi in the liberation and building up of modern Italy may justly be revealed. In the main these Memoirs consist of letters, pages from Crispi's Journals, and official documents that are now made public for the first time, and they are connected by a running commentary and narrative of events by Signor T. Palamenghi-Crispi.

MESSRS. JACK announce that on the 27th inst. they will issue the first twelve volumes of a series to be entitled "The People's Books." The series, which will ultimately embrace the whole field of modern knowledge, will consist of entirely new books by the best writers of the day. The publishers aim at forming a genuine library for the people, in plain language, at a price within the reach of the humblest reader. The volumes will be strongly bound in cloth, and issued at 6d. net per volume. The first twelve volumes deal with such subjects as Botany, Heredity, Chemistry, Electricity, Astronomy, Roman Catholicism, Women's Suffrage, Shakespeare, and Dante, and the list of contributors contains many eminent names. Particulars of the first sixty volumes in the series are announced on the prospectus.

MR. ANDREW MELROSE has in the press a review of recent international crises and the course of British foreign policy, by Mr. G. H. Perris, entitled "Our Foreign Policy and Sir Edward Grey's Failure." The principles of a rational foreign policy are discussed, with special reference to our relations with Germany and Russia and the competition in armaments. A chronological table of world-politics in the last forty years is added for purposes of reference.

"Who shall ascend unto the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands and a pure heart."—Ps. xxiv.

Do you remember how Chaucer hated the friars, and thought them bad men because they did not act up to what they said? We are going to-day to talk of another great Englishman who lived at the same time as Chaucer, and thought just as he did about the friars. But first, I don't want you to think that the friars had always been bad. If we take the trouble to find out what their name meant, to start with, we shall see that it could not have been so. "Friar" comes from the Italian word, which means "brother." Brothers, you know, are good and kind to each other (or should be so), and the first friars were so called because they made up their minds that they would live as if every man they met were their brother, and be equally good and kind to everybody—strangers and enemies alike. And to know how they came to make up their minds to this, we must leave England for a little while and go across the sea to Italy.

You will see a little place marked "Assisi" on the map, among the mountains which run north and south down the middle of Italy. Well, about 140 years before Chaucer lived, and Wyclif—that is to say, in the reign of King John in England—an Italian boy was born in the little Italian town of Assisi, who was one of the best men ever known on earth, so good that after he died he was always called Saint Francis. He had not always been so good. His father was a rich merchant, and Francis, while he was growing up, was very fond of spending a great deal of money on himself and his friends, on fine clothes and grand meals and all sorts of silly pleasures that did nobody any good. At the same time he was not altogether bad, as he was a brave knight, always ready to fight for anyone that was in trouble, and he was so merry and such "good company" that all his friends liked him. But when he was twenty-two he had a very bad illness—a fever from which he nearly died. And then he began to think, as he was getting better, could he go on living in the same sort of way as before, spending money on himself, and taking no notice of all the poor people round him, many of them so poor that they could sometimes hardly get a crust of bread? He thought to himself, "What is the good, when one comes to die, of all these things that I have been so fond of? All that matters to us then is whether we have lived in a way to please God, and Jesus Christ told us that we could best please God by loving and helping everyone as if they were our brothers, and not by laying up money for ourselves and living for our own comfort."

But it was not easy to change his way of life all in a moment. So he used to go often to pray in a little chapel on the top of a hill among the woods near Assisi, and while he was praying there one day that God would show him what was right and would help him to keep to it, he thought the figure of Jesus Christ on the crucifix in front of him moved and spoke, telling him to do as He did—to go about all his life doing good to poor people and sick people, helping and comforting them by telling them that they had a Father in heaven who loved them, and that there was a better life to come. When Francis heard this he had no longer any doubt what to do. He gave all his money, his clothes, and everything that belonged to him to be divided among the poor people of Assisi, leaving himself only a gown of rough serge, and from that time forward till the end of his life he thought of nothing but of helping the poor, and treating everyone he met as if they were his brothers. He travelled about Italy with no money and no food, depending on the kindness of people for his living, and telling them how God loved them, and how, if they would try to do as Christ said, no real harm could come to them though they might often have to go through troubles in this life. He himself had great troubles and hardships to go through, especially when he first began this way of life. He was often hungry and thirsty and half frozen in winter, and very often people would think him mad, and the children would even throw stones at him, but through it all he never gave up doing what he thought was right, and at the same time was kind and gentle with everybody and everything—with animals just as much as with people. He loved the birds and called them his brothers and sisters, and once on a small island near Venice he preached a little sermon to them, and they all flocked round him to listen. Everyone loved him; when he came to a village the people used to run out of their houses to hear what he had to say. There are several pretty stories about his kindness to animals. Once a hare was brought him which had been caught in a trap. He let it out and stroked it, and the hare was so fond of him that although he set it down on the ground to run home if it liked, it always came back to him, and at last he had to take it out into the middle of the forest where it had lived and leave it there. Another day he was being rowed across a lake, when the boatman, who had been fishing, gave him a very big fish—a tench, which he had just pulled out of the water. Francis thanked him for it, but put it back directly into the water, telling it to praise God for its safety. This may sound very funny to you, as I dare say you think animals cannot know anything about God, but Francis thought differently, and perhaps he was wiser than we are. He thought that all things living were God's children, and called them all his brothers and sisters, and the creatures knew somehow that he loved them, and would never run away from him as they would from other men.

Well, perhaps now you wonder how I am ever going to get back to England. You will see soon. I have told you all this about St. Francis because I want you to realise that though he was a Roman Catholic, and the great Englishman, Wyclif, whom I shall tell you about next week, opposed, the Roman Catholics in many ways, they were both of them good and great men. I want you to remember that there are good people in every religion, whether it is the religion which we have been taught to think right or not.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE MORAL EDUCATION LEAGUE.

Address by Mrs. Bryant.

THE fourteenth annual meeting of the Moral Education League was held on Tuesday evening, February 13, at the Royal Society of Arts, Mr. G. P. Gooch, M.P., presiding. An extremely interesting address on "The Many-Sidedness of Moral Education" was given by Mrs. Sophia Bryant, D.Sc., Litt.D., Head-mistress of the North London Collegiate School for Girls.

Mr. Gooch expressed regret at the unavoidable absence of Professor Mackenzie, the President. Referring to the report, he said they could look back on a year of quiet and steady progress, which was better than a too-rapid advancement which might be followed by retrogression. There had been an increase in the work, in the number of subscribers, in the interest and value of their movement all round, and he thought it sufficient proof that they were casting their net very wide when it was stated that those who supported them were not of one class, political party, or creed more than another. He believed that after a good deal of misunderstanding the national, constructive, and non-aggressive character of the society was coming to be recognised, and that they had overcome the idea which once existed that it was hostile to religion. The speaker paid a warm tribute to the work of Mr. F. J. Gould, whose labours on behalf of their cause had been untiring. The work which he did was of national importance. Not only had he delivered over 50 lectures in the British Isles during the past year, and nearly the same number in the United States, but in his book, "Youth's Noble Path," he had approached the subject of moral education from the Oriental point of view, and had been the means of extending their teaching to India. He reminded his hearers in conclusion of the Second International Moral Instruction Conference to be held at The Hague during the summer, which was being organised by a committee on which the League is represented.

Mrs. Bryant in her lecture dealt in a sympathetic and illuminating way with the moral education of the child, although, she said, she realised that in the time at her disposal she could not hope to treat so exhaustively the "many-sidedness" of her subject, as she might be expected to do by those who had read the title of her address. One of the most important aspects of moral education, she pointed out, was the training of character, the development from vagueness of motive and feebleness of purpose into a personality on whom we could rely, determined in action, with steady purposes in life implying an ideal to which all particular desires are subordinated. Here we came upon the contrast between egoism and altruism, between the individualism of the self-regarding whose efforts were all directed to the maintenance of their own happiness and success, and the larger spirit of devotion to the common welfare which need not necessarily crush out personal initiative and self-realisation, but which resulted in the fusing of these qualities in the activities which were helping to bring about a better social order. Egoism was a force which it was impossible to ignore. It was of great value in the formation of character, therefore it must seriously be taken into account. Character tends largely to develop on egoistic lines, and we are scarcely aware how much it is so influenced until it becomes excessive, as in the case of a Sir Willoughby Patterne, or, to take a coarser type, of a Bill Sykes. Parents often unwisely foster the self-regarding qualities by emphasising the necessity for "getting on in the world," which can only be done if character is strengthened in the direction of power of will, determination, endurance, the suppression of sympathies which might get in the way of success, and the insistence on prudence and self-interest as a means of achieving material ends. Any scheme for moral education, however, must appeal in some sense that is understood by the individual to the individual's desire for his own good, since it is only when the personality has been wisely developed, and all its needs and aspirations unified and controlled, that he will be able to respond with intelligence and enthusiasm to the ideal of the common good. If any man, for instance, sacrificed his personality as an originator of ideas, he ceased to serve others and to contribute his share to the common stock.

But man, as an individual, no less than as a member of society, needs the moral appeal, the desire for what was termed in Hebraic language righteousness, cleanness of heart, purity, and singleness of purpose. This might be described in secular phraseology as the quest for self-perfection, which Plato and Aristotle knew. Every man pursues his own good, but the intelligent man pursues it wisely. He calls it the search for happiness, but he discovers that in order to achieve this he must turn away from many roads that seem to lead in the direction of happiness, only to find that, like virtue, it is the fruit of wisdom. The lecturer then drew an interesting comparison between the Way of Religion—the identification of the individual will with the purpose that rules the universe, and the identification of this divine purpose with the winning over of the human race to righteousness; and the Way of Reason—the Greek Spirit, which was also the modern scientific spirit, with its systematic ideal of personal virtue, the counterpart of the Hebrew prophet's thirst for righteousness. Men advanced along either of these paths according to impulse or inclination, but the plain man set at the back of his ethical faith a simple pragmatic philosophy conveying the assurance that he was not striving and working in vain.

It should be recognised by teachers that all minds cannot be urged along the same lines, and that they themselves should not teach what they do not believe or understand, nor take their learners out of their depth. It was especially desirable that the way of religion which holds the field in the schools at the present time should be supplemented by such direct social teaching as would make its application universally clear. Religion should be taught as a practical way of life. In referring more particularly to the early training of children, Mrs. Bryant laid stress on the need for teaching the young to show consideration for others, a part of moral education which is sadly neglected in these days, when, in her opinion, people sacrifice themselves too much to the pleasures of the child. The family was the best of all schools for the drawing out of unselfish instincts, and the claims made by the family, particularly among the poorer classes, upon the child were of great value for the purpose of forming character. Mrs. Bryant also dealt with the influence of the school-training, which has its advantages and disadvantages, and in conclusion summarised the principal directions which ought to be taken in the development of moral character in the young:—(1) The transformation of wayward impulse into a system of steady purposes; (2) the evolution of altruism side by side with normal egoism in wholesome social life; (3) training to a sense of duty, a freely moving conscience, liberality in submitting within limits to the social will, and, last but not least, the self-training of character to independent initiative and sturdy adhesion to purposes freely chosen.

A vote of thanks to the lecturer was moved by Mr. Waldegrave, chairman of the executive committee, seconded by Mr. F. J. Gould, who urged that in the teaching of morals maxims should be avoided as much as possible. Whether they took the way of religion or the way of reason, the appeal must be made with sympathy and insight to those fundamental ideas of goodness which are so quickly awakened by example and suggestion.

PIONEER WORK IN NEW ZEALAND.

The Van Movement in the Antipodes.

AN interesting and important extension of the Van Mission movement has been successfully carried out in New Zealand under the direction of the Rev. R. J. Hall, M.A., of Auckland. Mr. Hall conducted many van meetings in England and Scotland, and went out with the intention of introducing open-air methods if opportunities offered in his new sphere of work. Plans and specifications were sent out from the Mission at home, and by the beginning of November the new van was ready for the road. The undercarriage had to be supplied, but the body of the caravan was built by Mr. Hall and eight young men.

The opening meeting of the Mission was held in Auckland by the Grey statue, on November 6. Mr. Hall delivered an address upon the Bible. "There was anxiety as well as anticipation on the part of the members of the congregation as to the reception likely to be accorded this effort, and they scattered themselves among the audience to gather what impression was made. And they were not disappointed. The missionary pointed out that the van had been built at home, that it was going to cost £3 a week "to run," and he wanted a show of hands from those who agreed that a mission of that type was necessary in New Zealand. "That is honest dealing, at any rate," came the response, and a big majority of the hands went up to keep the meetings going. There was a call for a collection, and 12s. came in. Each evening in Auckland the attendance rose to about 400 or 450, and sympathy increased as the week wore on.

Part of the second week was spent at Pukekohe, where, however, the population was so busy with comedy companies, prohibition meetings and towns' meetings that it was only for half an hour the missionary could hold his audiences on their way to other functions. The third week, which was spent in Huntly, a coal mining town, completely justified the mission. The audiences were large, the interest was maintained, the questions were of a high order, and the sympathy of the people was marked by the fact that the week's collections covered the working expenses.

There was some misgiving about the move to Ngaruawahia, a Maori settlement, but contrary to expectation it yielded splendid meetings, and Mr. Hall lent one of his hearers a copy of the Hibbert Journal to satisfy his interest in liberal theology. Less success attended the meetings in Hamilton, the largest town on the route. The questions were of a poorer type, and the General Election was in progress. A six days' journey (!) brought the van to Waihi, and the meetings were largely spoiled by the intervention of a second ballot and by rain. Two exceptionally good meetings were held, however, and the gold miners asked Mr. Hall, without a dissentient, to give them a second week, and, if possible, to take the Miners' Hall for lectures. He was accordingly returning there on January 3, and hoped also to arrange a Sunday service during the Rev. William Wooding's visit to Auckland. Mr. Hall writes: "I am more than convinced that Waihi is 'our' town for a progressive church. None of the other churches have made any headway in the last ten years. They are all despondent and think that atheism is rampant. Not more than 10 per cent. of the population are churchgoers, but I know from the eagerness with which they received an attempt to combine reason with theology that they are ripe for our work. I don't intend to let Waihi drop, and you need not be surprised if in a year's time I am writing home for a goldfield missionary!"

VAN-TRAVELLING IN NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. Hall's reports contain interesting notes on differences between vanning in England and in New Zealand. Speaking of the journey from Auckland to Pukekohe he writes:—"The journey in England would be completed easily in one day, and that with one horse, save under exceptional circumstances. Here the roads are in many places clay, and for long distances. After dry weather clay gives a better surface than a metalled road, but after wet weather such as we had their condition beggars description. Fortunately for the lay-missioner and myself, three of our van-builders came for a few miles, as they thought, but as it turned out for the entire journey of three days. We lost our way and stuck in the middle of a clay hill. After toiling for two hours a passing horseman informed us that we were on the wrong road. Back we started, our grey nag going so cheerfully down hill that we began to congratulate ourselves on his renewed willingness. At the next hill, however, he stopped suddenly, nearly capsizing the van. After vain efforts to persuade him into motion we sorrowfully released him from his chains, and four disgusted missionaries pushed the van uphill with the help of a willing but overworked shaft-horse. At every hill afterwards our grey refused, so that we had to camp two nights by the roadside and get farmers' plough horses as and when we could to get us into Pukekohe."

There is a vivid note about the six days' journey to Waihi. "Three days of this I was alone, then one of my lads came at the week-end when I had to return for Sunday services. As a sample of our little difficulties I was held up on this trip in the middle of a steep hill. After an hour of tugging the swing-tree smashed, and the van was only saved from a header into the creek at the bottom by the efficiency of the brake. Horses to help us could not be obtained because it was election day, and 'pink ribbons' (brewers' adherents) had secured them. Fortunately, with the aid of some stout rope I managed to lash the harness and got the van into Morrinsville for repairs. Had it not been for the help of two young fellows returning from the poll I doubt if the nag could ever have managed that hill. At another stage of the same journey the road reminds one of the stage coach stories that are told of the wild and woolly West. On one side a sheer drop, and, on the other, overhanging cliff, the road winding like an S all the way up, and with boulders so huge embedded in the clay that to get your wheel on top of one of them would be to have your van toppled over the cliff."

Mr. Hall was to take his holiday after January, 3 and is hoping to use the van in Auckland regularly twice a week for lecturing at Sir George Grey's statue, particularly at mid-day, when he hopes to catch the business men. He speaks with high appreciation of the generosity of his congregation in connection with the whole movement, and especially of the loyalty of those who were distrustful of the movement and feared that it would lower the dignity of the church.

SUSTENTATION FUND.

THE annual general meeting of contributors to the Sustentation Fund for the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends was held on Wednesday, February 14, at Dr. Williams's Library, London. Mr. W. Byng Kendrick in the chair. There were also present Principal Carpenter, of Oxford, the Rev. James Harwood, Mr. E. J. Blake, Mr. John Harrison, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. L. N. Williams, of Aberdare, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and Mr. Frank Preston, hon. secretary.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, emphasised the need of keeping central funds in close touch with local needs. They were, he said, as a board, open to co-operate with other bodies in any way that would extend and develop the usefulness of the fund. The motion was seconded by Dr. Carpenter and carried unanimously.

The following managers who retired by rotation were re-elected, viz., the Rev. W. H. Drummond and Messrs. E. J. Blake, W. B. Kendrick, W. Long, F. Preston, and J. C. Warren; and the appointment of Mr. B. P. Burroughs, of Liverpool, to fill a vacancy was approved.

The following resolutions were also passed:—

"That the contributors approve of the action of the managers in endeavouring, in co-operation with the National Conference, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Stipend Augmentation Fund, to formulate an appeal for a fund to provide more adequate stipends for the ministers of our churches throughout the country."

"That the sincere thanks of the contributors be tendered to Mr. W. Byng Kendrick for his services as President during the past year, and that Mr. Kendrick be elected President for the year 1912."

"That the contributors have heard with much regret that Mr. Edgar Chatfield Clarke has felt obliged to ask to be relieved of the duties of honorary treasurer, and accord to him their cordial thanks for his services during the past seventeen years, and request him to continue to act until a suitable successor is appointed."

"That the thanks of the contributors be given to Mr. Frank Preston for his services during the past year, and that he be appointed honorary secretary for the year 1912."

"That the services of Mr. Edwin W. Marshall, as honorary auditor, be gratefully acknowledged, and that he be requested to accept the office for the year 1912."

"That the contributors heartily thank the trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, who have generously granted the use of rooms for the meetings of the fund during the past year."

"That the thanks of the meeting be given to the chairman for his services in the chair."

SUMMARY OF ANNUAL REPORT.

In presenting their annual report to the contributors, the managers of the fund have to state that the amount at their disposal during the past year has been somewhat more than usual, owing to some accumulations of income during recent years, and that, consequently, they have been able to make a rather more liberal distribution of grants.

Several congregations, which have been without permanent ministers, have not been able to apply for grants, but, on the other hand, grants have been made to several congregations which had not previously received assistance from the fund. The managers desire, however, to state that, in their opinion, the grants which they have made have not been sufficient to enable the assisted congregations in many cases to provide adequate stipends for their ministers. Throughout the country the cost of living has undoubtedly increased, but the amount which the congregations have been able to provide for their ministers' stipends has practically remained stationary, with the result that the ministers are in a relatively worse position, and that the need for a larger income at the disposal of the managers of this fund becomes continually more urgent.

The Joint Committee of the National Conference, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Augmentation and the Sustentation Funds, upon which this Fund has been represented by several of its managers, has held several meetings during the year, and a conference has also recently taken place in London between representatives of the Augmentation and Sustentation Funds, and the managers have reason to believe that the results of these conferences will shortly be published, and that a scheme will be put forward to obtain the necessary funds to provide more adequate stipends for the ministers of those congregations which at present cannot do so themselves.

Owing to the deaths or resignations of several of the ministers of these churches during the year, the full amount of the grants made has in a few cases not been actually paid.

Your managers are pleased to report that they continue to exchange information with other funds of a similar character throughout the country, which enables them to exercise additional judgment in the distribution of the grants.

With regard to finance, the income of the fund has again suffered by the loss of subscriptions owing to the death of several of the older contributors, and this will be still more apparent in the accounts of the following years, unless new subscribers can be found to make up the deficiency. Meanwhile the board was able out of accumulations of previous years to make an investment of £300, which was added to their holding in India 3½ per cent stock. The treasurer recorded, as usual, the amounts deducted for income tax on the income of the fund.

The fund has again sustained heavy loss during the year by the death of Mr. David Martineau, one of its first managers, who, as mentioned in a recent report, had rendered exceptional service to the Fund. Other losses include such well-known names as the Rt. Hon. Lord Airedale, Miss Preston, of London, Miss Wallace, of Bath, and Mr. Frank Evers, of Stourbridge.

During the year ending December 31, 1911, the income of the fund was £1,855 3s. 5d., including a balance carried forward from 1910 of £406 15s. 8d.; £1,384 15s. 10d. has been expended in grants, £321 13s. 3d. has been invested, and a balance of £131 3s. 6d. is carried forward to 1912.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., the well-known Unitarian minister of Cambridge, Mass., will preach the Annual Sermon at the Whit-week Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London. The innovation of last year, of holding the service on the Tuesday evening, will be followed on May 28 this year.

THE Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at their meeting on Wednesday, February 14, resolved that a statement be issued calling attention to the Tercentenary of the Unitarian Martyrs who were put to death in March and April, 1612. It is suggested that Palm Sunday (March 31) would be a suitable day for a special service, as this date will be intermediate to the actual date of the martyrdom of Bartholomew Legate and of Edward Wightman. A leaflet containing a few biographical and historical details is in course of preparation, and will be issued shortly. Meanwhile, it is suggested that ministers and secretaries should consider the advisability of making an announcement in their Church Calendars for March.

THE programme of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian congregations, which will be held in Birmingham from April 16 to 19, has been completed, and we are in a position to give some important particulars. The preacher will be the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead. The Rev. L. P. Jacks will read a paper on Bergson, and the Rev. Dr. Mellone one on "Prayer." Among other subjects will be "The significance of Jesus for his age and our own," "Unemployment," and "Our Congregational Life and Institutions." At the Public Meeting the speakers will be the Revs. Dr. Crothers, F. K. Freeston, and W. G. Tarrant, Mrs. H. D. Roberts, and Mr. F. Maddison. The following will act as chairmen:—The Rev. H. E. Dowson, Professor G. Dawes Hicks, Principal Carpenter, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, and Mr. Lawrence Holt. The breadth and catholicity of the Conference platform will be shown by the presence as honoured guests of the Rev. A. L. Lilley, Canon of Hereford, and Mr. C. G. Montefiore. Canon Lilley will read a paper on "Christianity and the Moral Ideal," and Mr. Montefiore will contribute a paper to the discussion on "The Significance of Jesus for his age and our own," another on the same subject being given by the Rev. H. J. Rossington, of Belfast.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Aberdeen: Unitarian Church.—The Rev. Lucking Tavenor, who has scarcely been settled at Aberdeen twelve months in succession to the Rev. Alex. Webster, has won a distinct place for himself among the preachers in the city. His interest in literature and art enables him to make a varied appeal to those who attend his church, and he has endeavoured to show how great an influence for good the works of great masters may exercise on the minds and hearts of the people. Mr. Tavenor recently delivered an interesting address on "Holland, and Dutch Art," illustrated by lantern slides, before a large audience, at the Art Gallery.

Burnley: Trafalgar-street Church.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, February 11, at Trafalgar-street Church, the Rev. Wm. J. Piggott being the preacher. In the morning he gave an address to the children on "Children's Gardens," illustrating it by rapid coloured chalk sketches on the blackboard. In the afternoon he took for his subject "The Transfigured Church," and in the evening preached on "The Ministry to the Saints." The services were extremely well attended, and it is encouraging to learn that an increase in the list of church members has been reported at every congregational meeting since Mr. Piggott's settlement. The newly-founded primary department and other church institutions, are also increasing their members and doing well.

Chesham Unitarian Congregation.—At the annual congregational meeting, which was held in January, the Committee of Chesham Unitarian Congregation reported that twelve ordinary members had been admitted in 1911. The number on the roll on December 31, 1911, was 135. The committee estimated that the expenditure in 1912 would exceed income by about £62. A sum of £105 would therefore have to be raised by means of special efforts if they were to be free from debt at the end of the year.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Church of the Divine Unity.—During the Sunday evenings in the present month the Rev. Alfred Hall is giving a series of addresses on "Eastern Thought." On Sunday, February 4, his subject was "A Hindoo Book—Bhagavad-gita"; on Sunday, February 11, "Buddhism." On Sunday, February 18, there will be another address on "Buddhism," and the series will conclude on Sunday, February 25, with "Mohammedanism."

Scarborough: Westborough Unitarian Church.—The annual meeting of the Westborough Unitarian Church was held on Friday, February 9, when it was reported that there had been an increase in the number of people attending the evening services, and reference was made to the fourteen sermons on "Comparative Religion," preached by the minister, the Rev. J. Wain, which had been much appreciated. The year had been a successful one also for the various societies and institutions connected with the church, the Sunday-school showing an increase of fifteen members, with an average attendance of 62 per cent.

Sheffield: Upper (Unitarian) Chapel.—By the death of Mr. J. Figorski, which occurred on Tuesday, February 13, at the age of 84, Upper (Unitarian) Chapel has lost its oldest member. Mr. Figorski's life had been an eventful one. He belonged to a noble Polish family, and was born in a little town in Russian Poland. His father took a prominent part in the Polish insurrection of 1830, and the son imbibed Republican sympathies from his very cradle. He reached manhood in time to join in Hungary's struggle for independence under Kossuth, and with other enthusiastic young Poles had a full share of the desperate fighting which eventually succumbed to the Russo-Austrian alliance. This was between the years 1848 and 1850. After a period as a State prisoner in Turkey, whither the fugitives had been driven by the Russian and Austrian armies, Mr. Figorski was sent to England. He was taken charge of by a refugee committee in Liverpool, and subsequently succeeded in earning a livelihood as a blacksmith's striker. Later on he went to Sheffield, and the years that followed were full of strenuous toil, but ultimately he became a partner of one of the first case makers in the city. He was naturalised over forty years ago, and had been a member of the Unitarian Chapel for fifty years. Exiled Poles who came to Sheffield ever found in him a ready sympathiser and helper. The funeral service, which was held on Thursday, was conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street.

Wood Green.—The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie presided at the annual meeting held on February 6, at which there was a pleasant addition to the usual order of proceedings in the presentation to Mr. John Sudbery of a resolution passed by the meeting thanking him for his services from the beginning in establishing Unitarian worship in Wood Green. He has acted as chairman of committee, still holds the position of secretary, and he was now congratulated on the completion of his duties as treasurer of the building fund, his efforts to raise the balance of the permanent loan as a memorial to the late Dr. Mummery having been crowned with success. The church, which was built in 1901, is now completely paid for, and the buildings are free from debt. A bronze tablet recording Dr. Mummery's long ministry will be unveiled shortly. The annual report for 1911 records that activities have been well maintained, and, thanks to £100 raised by the Ladies' Working Society, current expenses have been met, and the coming year has hopeful prospects.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—The second meeting of the present session of the Yorkshire Unitarian Club was held at Chapel-lane Chapel, Bradford, on Saturday, February 3, Mr. F. G. Jackson, Leeds, occupying the chair. The Chairman thanked the Club for the honour it had done him by electing him at the annual meeting in November as President for 1911-12. The Rev. Stanley Mellor, Ph.D. (Rotherham), read a paper on "The Religion of a Sensible Layman." Lack of sense, he said, in both ministers and laity, would show itself nowhere more than in religion, and yet religion was as necessary a factor in human life as anything else. Nevertheless, many men who aimed to be successful would deny any need for religion and would say a man need not, in any case, let it interfere with his business. In the ultimate issue, this view was not sense, but folly. The real man of sense was a man of feeling, imagination and sentiment. He did not confine his interests to a narrow view of life, and did not spend all his time considering how he might better his own position. He let his sympathy be awakened by the sight of suffering and misery. He might not think very deeply on abstruse problems of philosophy, but he had a whole view of life. If he hated anything at all it was cant, hypocrisy and self-seeking. The real man of sense had a certain feeling of loyalty; he lived his days always striving to discharge the responsibility which he felt the mere possession of life placed upon him. In every man of sense, then, the base and work of religion were always present. He would see that real religion was not an external, but an inward matter, a matter of the heart, of the deepest personal experience. Religion would rest for the man of sense on experience, about which he was usually silent; he would refuse to regulate his religion by attending to some external authority. He might see the great organised churches, instead of concentrating on points on which all were agreed, dealing with what seemed to be merely useless wrangling, and this might breed in him a complete indifference to all forms of organised religion. But this, however regrettable, did not destroy personal religion, for religion was not a creed, an infallible book, a Church, or even membership of a Church, but inward faith. The lecturer further said that the effect of a man's choice was inevitably seen in the general contour of his life, in the spirit of his activities. He saw that he could not really get through his life well without religion. So, day by day, the sensible man would find himself walking in the Divine presence, moving on to ever higher regions of truth. On the motion of the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, seconded by Mr. J. H. Brook (Bradford), a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Dr. Mellor for his paper. The next meeting of the Club will be held on March 16, at Dewsbury Unitarian Church, when the Rev. W. R. Shanks (Holbeck) will read a paper on "The Church and Speculative Theology."

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The usual quarterly meeting was held at Halifax on Saturday, February 10. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. C. H. Boyle. The Rev. J. J. Wright, the President of the Sunday School Association, delivered an address, and conveyed the greetings of the Association at London to the gathering of teachers and scholars. In the course of his address Mr. Wright emphasised the necessity of the teachers realising the fact that the moulding of the young life of the present generation is practically in their hands. Statistics were furnished showing the proportion of children who were received in the Sunday schools, together with information as to the percentage of adults who become members of the different religious denominations. Mr. Wright concluded that those engaged in Sunday school work had every reason to be encouraged in the work in which they were engaged. Questions followed, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks moved and the Rev. W. Rosling seconded a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Wright. The Halifax friends were also cordially thanked for their hospitality.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

£45,000 FOR BEDFORD COLLEGE.

Lord Haldane has informed the Council of Bedford College for Women that he has received from a donor who wishes, at present, to remain anonymous, the sum of £30,000 towards the building and endowment fund. Another anonymous friend of the College has promised £10,000 for the erection of a hall and common rooms, and the Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths have granted £5,000 towards an endowment fund. These generous gifts will enable the Council to carry out their complete building scheme, which has already made such a good start on the fine site acquired for the purpose in Regent's Park.

THE CARE OF INFANTS AND YOUNG CHILDREN.

A conference is being convened by the Central London Branch of the Women's Labour League on the care of babies and young children, which will be held at Essex Hall next month. Many well-known medical men and women, social reformers, and politicians have promised to be present and take part in the discussions, among them being Miss N. Adler, Mrs. Creighton, Sir Victor Horsley, Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., and Mr. R. C. K. Ensor. The conference will open with papers on "Nurture versus Education," by Miss Margaret Macmillan, and on the "Provision for Maternity," by Miss Llewelyn Davies, the chair at this session being taken by Dr. Marion Phillips. The second session will be presided over by Miss Lily Montague, when papers will be read by Dr. Ethel Bentham on "The Work of the Baby Clinic, the Memorial of the Women's Labour League to Margaret Macdonald and Mary Middleton," and by Mrs. Despard on "Training for Parenthood."

JOSEPH LISTER: IN MEMORIAM.

The following tribute to the late Lord Lister appeared in the Westminster Gazette the day after his death was announced, over the initials G. H. R. D. "So Joseph Lister is dead—if a man can be said to touch Death who so hallowed and explained Life. The years of man come to an end, of course; existence would be intolerable if they did not. Greatness becomes complicated by titular recognition, and by all those unsought 'vanities' which are no longer vanities when a man is not vain. But Time, who winnows the sifting-board, keeps true greatness to 'garner and put by,' when all meretricious and ephemeral things slip past his devising fingers, and become only of the quick dust of quicker Oblivion. We are proud politically to-day of the French entente, but the truer and greater and more democratic entente was when Lister profited by the work of Pasteur! That was the beneficent entente which reacted in the cancelling of human misery throughout the wide world. And Pasteur is sometime dead, and Lister has just died, and as both are immortal there is no Death."

KING'S COLLEGE THEOLOGICAL HOSTEL.

An appeal was made in the autumn for assistance towards building a hostel for theological students at King's College. In response, about £4,000 has been received or promised, but a further sum of £10,000 is required if advantage is to be taken of an offer made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of a site by Vincent Square, during the last two years King's College has sent out more than 80 clergy to work in London.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF THE DEAF.

Comments have recently been made on the disinclination which is shown by most people to employ blind persons in any capacity. The same hindrance stands in the way of deaf people, and a letter has recently been written to the press by the Rev. F. W. G. Gilby, chaplain-superintendent of St. Saviour's Church for the Deaf and Dumb, advocating the employment of deaf sorters in the General Post Office. "In the late Mr. Fawcett's time," he says, "a number of deaf sorters were taken on, and one survives and is at work. Why have no additional hands been taken on? Why, when the deaf can in so many cases read orders from the lips and speak back an answer, are no more being allowed to prove their efficiency? One cannot help feeling that the printed circular invariably sent to any application on behalf of the deaf shows stereotyped prejudice. If a real wish existed at headquarters to do something generous and helpful, I cannot but feel that the thing would be done at once. 'Drive away applications and save ourselves a little trouble' seems to be the position at present adopted, instead of the more noble and better attitude of 'take a little trouble and use some of the wasted power that exists.' I know many merely deaf, not dumb, who would be glad of such work as sorting if a fresh beginning is to be made."

PRESENTATION TO MISS EMILY DAVIES.

Miss Emily Davies was the recipient of an address, together with a cheque for seven hundred guineas last week in recognition of her fifty years' work on behalf of women. The money was raised by the various groups of women who have profited by her labours, especially medical women, teachers, women in Local Government, past and present students of Girton College, members of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, and others. Miss Jones, Mistress of Girton, who read the address and made the presentation, told Miss Davies that a tablet, inscribed "Emily Davies Court" had been put up over the oldest part of the College building in her honour. Miss Davies has given the money presented to her to Girton College.

A POPULAR GARDENING ANNUAL.

The seventeenth issue of that popular annual, "One and All Gardening," is as full of attractive articles as ever, and delightfully illustrated. Mr. Greening, the editor, who always writes with great enthusiasm on the possibilities of repairing the waste places in our land, and making the desert blossom like a rose, has a suggestive article entitled "Beauty for Ashes," in which he propounds a far-reaching scheme for developing the work of horticultural societies throughout the kingdom. He also gives a description of a visit which he paid to Port Sunlight for the purpose of opening the annual flower show. The Hon. H. A. Stanhope contributes some interesting notes on roses, Mrs. Edwards-Webb writes on "The Call of the Waste Lands," Mr. James Crabtree on "Shore Gardens," Mr. W. Francis Rankine on "The Fowls of the Air," Mr. S. Leonard Bastin on "The Growing of Christmas Trees," and Miss Maud Sargent on "The Flowers of the Dawning Year." This by no means exhausts the list of articles, all of which contain valuable information about gardening pursuits, birds, bees, or "insect pests," such as the tiger moth, which is considered by Mr. J. Scott one of the most beautiful of them all.

NATIONAL FOOD REFORM ASSOCIATION.

We have received from the National Food Reform Association, 178, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, a new and revised edition, making 20,000 in all, of "Hints towards Diet Reform, with twenty-four Simple Recipes." This useful little publication may be obtained, price 3d. post free, from the secretary.

G. BERNARD SHAW, on Vivisection.

Lectures and Debates on Vivisection can be arranged with Mr. SIDNEY TRIST, the Editor of the Animals' Guardian, and Secretary of the London and Provincial Anti-Vivisection Society. The Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL (City Temple), presiding over a meeting addressed by Mr. Trist at Brighton, said that Mr. Trist's speech "was the most illuminating speech on vivisection he had ever heard." No fees, but bare railway expenses. All applications to be made to Sidney Trist, Animals' Guardian, 22A, Regent-street, London, S.W. Ask for a free copy of Mr. Trist's Open Letter to the clergy who support vivisection. Name this paper.—ADVT.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It will be the fervent hope of all our readers that before these words are in their hands the threatened Coal Strike may be a thing of the past. The points in dispute have been reduced to a minimum and though the last concession is always the most difficult, a firm and considerate handling of the situation on the part of the Government ought to make agreement possible. The tension of the past few weeks has given fresh prominence to the social inter-dependence of all classes of the community. In a highly organised industrial society with its sensitive network of financial relationships no important trade can claim an uncontrolled liberty of action. On the other hand it has become equally plain that widely spread industrial unrest must spring from a serious and adequate cause. If, as we believe is the case, the cost of living has risen while wages have remained practically stationary, there must necessarily be a growing feeling of financial strain, which people in comfortable circumstances or with reserves of capital find it very hard to realise.

MANY people will share Mr. Ponsonby's sense of "deep disappointment" at the inconclusive character of the debate on Persia in the House of Commons on Wednesday. There had been strong hope, evidently ill founded, that Sir Edward Grey would be in a position to announce the withdrawal of Russian troops and the dawn of a brighter future. The whole situation is still involved in darkness and mystery. The rivalry between Russia and ourselves, which the Agreement has sought to limit and define, dominates the situation in such a way as to make the rights and liberties of Persia subordinate, and creates the danger that her independence may be sacrificed at any moment to a diplomatic situation. Sir Edward Grey urged that it was not a very easy matter to keep the Persian Government on its feet, and yet get order re-established throughout Persia by Persian resources alone. That was what he wished to see done, that was what the Foreign Office would try to do, that was what with patience he thought they would succeed in doing. With this assurance we must for the moment be content.

A MEETING promoted by the Canterbury House of Laymen was held in the Albert Hall on Tuesday in order to protest against Welsh Disestablishment. The Archbishop of Canterbury based his case largely on the importance of the national avowal of religion, and spoke of the Church of England as the official mouthpiece of a nation's allegiance—as a nation—to Jesus Christ. If disestablishment took place "the nation as such would have ceased to act and speak for Him, to Him : would have ceased, as a people, to unfurl to the winds of Heaven the banner of the Cross, and to march forward in our common efforts for the bettering of men's lives with that banner held visibly aloft." Subsequently Sir Alfred Cripps spoke in the same strain. "The motive and purport of Establishment," he said, "were not to gain privilege for the Church but Christianity for a nation. It implied on the side of the Church the duty of national service, on the side of the State the duty of recognising Christian morality and Christian teaching in the work of government and legislation."

MUCH as we may sympathise with these lofty appeals to the religious side of national life, they rest upon a failure to recognise the real facts of the situation. It cannot be pretended that the Church of England is in any sense co-extensive with national Christianity, or that Nonconformity only represents the wayward dissidence of dissent which will ultimately be overcome. Face to face with things as they are, these pleas for the national recognition of religion require a constructive policy of reform, a spirit of breadth and inclusiveness, and a moderation in the high claims of episcopacy, if they are to have any value for religious people as a whole. The Westminster Gazette reminds the Archbishop that at the Investiture of the Prince of Wales two Nonconformist ministers were associated with two bishops in the religious part of the ceremonial. It was felt that this was the only right and fitting way of securing that the occasion should be truly national in its religious aspects.

WE stated lately on what seemed to be good authority that the Supreme Civil Court of Madrid had made a practical avowal of the innocence of Francisco Ferrer by ordering the restitution of his goods. Mr. William Archer, who was responsible for giving prominence to the statement in the English press, has now written as follows :—

"I stated, you will remember, that the source of my information was a Belgian newspaper, but added that there seemed to be no reason to doubt its authenticity. It appears that I was over-hasty, and that the news was only partially true. It is true that the confiscation of Ferrer's goods has been annulled ; but it was not by the Supreme Civil but by the Supreme Military Court ; and the judgment professes to be founded upon some technical point, and to leave the question of Ferrer's guilt or innocence untouched. I have not even yet the full text of the judgment before me, and the summary I have seen leaves it wholly incomprehensible why, if Ferrer was guilty, any part of the Barcelona sentence should have been reversed."

THE custom of keeping Lent is so old and so persistent that it may be taken to correspond to some deep-seated need of human nature. With a regulated observance which degenerates into a mere formalism about eating and drinking we have little sympathy. But the inward fast is quite another matter. The greatest danger to religion at the present time comes from the obsession of material things and the distracting and dissipating excitements amid which many people pass their lives. To call a truce to these things for a short space, to give more time to prayer and recollection and serious reading, to allow the stern and sacrificial side of religion to occupy a chief place in our thoughts, to accept and practise the discipline most suited to our special need, all this is a great gain alike to our interior peace and our spiritual efficiency in the world. We do not despise the religious uses of Sunday because there are men who keep a sabbath of the heart all the week, and wise people, only too deeply conscious of their own poverty of spirit, will not neglect special seasons of inward discipline and renewal because, perchance, the saints do not need them.

THERE are apparently some people, we fear sometimes they are an increasing number, who seem to think that it is brave and becoming to assume a jaunty or indifferent air in the presence of death. Mr. Graham Gilmour, the well-known aviator who was killed at Richmond on Saturday, left a request in his will that his funeral should be "merry and bright." We confess that the words seem to us entirely incongruous. They show little understanding either of the meaning of human sorrow or of the hushed solemnity of spirit which is our natural tribute to the mystery of death. Grief is sometimes enervating in its selfishness or merely pompous in its solemnity, but even this is better than any attempt to do violence to some of our deepest and most sensitive instincts. We do not want artificiality of any kind, but a parade of being "merry and bright" at a funeral is far worse than a parade of being silent and sad.

* * *

WE have heard with deep regret of the enforced retirement of the Rev. R. J. Campbell from many of his activities, but it is a matter of sincere rejoicing that the prohibition of his doctor does not extend to the pulpit. The modern world expects a constant dissipation of energy from its successful preachers, and uses them up too fast. Mr. Campbell has always done his best work in the pulpit, and many anxious friends will hear almost with relief, though with unfeigned concern at the cause, that for a season the pulpit is to have a solitary and undisputed claim upon his strength. Others may do the work of organisation or bear the brunt of controversy, but the preacher's power of clear vision and convincing speech cannot be delegated or shared. It is among the most singular and individual of human gifts, and at all times too rare to be subordinated to anything else.

NATIONAL CHRISTIANITY.

THERE is something distinctly inspiring about the thought of a national religion. It suggests the wealth of a great inheritance, a community of interest in the deepest things of life, a common faith and a common language which are independent of the shifting currents of our own day, rooted in the experience of the past, honoured and accepted by all. The solitary thinker welcomes it as a method of escape from the oppression of his loneliness into a larger and more human world. The prisoner of hope bewildered by party divisions and sectarian cries finds in it an ideal solid enough for earth and good enough for heaven. While the plain Christian recognises it as part of himself, as real as patriotism or national character which no party can annex and none can disavow. Our acute sense of ecclesiastical divisions and the atmosphere of competing loyalties which they create obscure the reality of a national Christianity and make us at times almost doubt its existence. But we have only to try to think it away or to get along without it, in order to realise how deeply it has penetrated into all the strata of the nation's life and created for us the spiritual conditions without which strong fellowship would be impossible, a common heart and a common conscience.

When, however, any section claims to be in some special or exclusive sense the representative or custodian of this national Christianity, all who stand outside that section and still feel their inalienable right to be partners in the common national inheritance are bound to demur. For this reason we think that some words which fell from the Archbishop of CANTERBURY in his recent Visitation Charge are unfortunate, and make claims which it is hard for men who want to be really national in sentiment to endorse. "The Church of England," he said, "claims to be accepted in this country as being, in a large sense, though with many limitations, the religious mouthpiece of the nation and the chief executive force of its religious life." It is no doubt more natural for the Church of England than for any other religious body in the land to make this claim. Her Catholic tradition and ancient buildings and her honoured position in all the great ceremonies of State have made it comparatively easy for her to be a church of long historical memories and deeply cherished national traditions. The Nonconformist bodies were long absorbed in a struggle for mere existence; and in an almost fanatical reverence for Reformation charters and Puritan ancestors they have at times seemed to waive their claim to an equal share in the rich spiritual inheritance of the pre-Reformation church. But those days are passing away, if they are not already gone. Since the break-up of the Latin Christianity of the West the Spirit has worked through a wide diversity of gifts and operations, and no one church has any monopoly either in national sentiment or the treasures of the past. We even doubt whether it is the part of spiritual wisdom to claim to be the predominant partner. Here in the spiritual unity of a common national life the method of majorities and statistics has little meaning. When we look away from the conflicts of the hour to the final result or try to weigh the spiritual products of life in even scales, who of us can tell the relative value of the ordered ritual of the cathedral compared with the Puritan simplicity of the meeting-house, or of the quiet sobriety of Anglican methods compared with the fervent appeals of the revivalist, or of the conserving force of a traditional theology compared with the illumination of the Quaker or the intellectual alertness of the Unitarian? They are all factors in our national Christianity and the soul of the nation dwells in them all.

But our object is not to enter into controversy with the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, except in so far as he seems to believe that he can annex the nation and the kindling power of national sentiment to one form of Christianity more than another. We desire rather to encourage all churches to enter more fully into possession of the splendour of their national inheritance. The open profession of common hopes and aims and the sense of a common religious spirit consecrating our national life will not impair the distinctiveness of their witness or the faithfulness with which they follow their special calling. But in this way they will escape from much pettiness of spirit and many vain controversies, and win a new power of understanding the value of forms of truth which they cannot accept and methods of worship to which they are temperamentally averse. National feeling is a very catholic thing, and it is the catholicity not of indifference but of just and honourable appreciation.

This common inheritance, of which we have been speaking, is interwoven so inextricably with the deepest strands of personal life, its holiest memories and its most familiar habits, that we hardly realise its existence except as part of ourselves. More than half our religion is born in us, and though later it may win the assent of our will it is never a matter of our unfettered choice. Our racial memories and the communal faith which claims us for its own belong to us by nature and make us what we are. Even when we think we have disowned them they are still there, "felt in the heart and felt along the blood." As Mr. JOHN MASEFIELD has written with admirable insight in a recent article in the Quest:

"To-day we are made richer at all holy moments by a body of thought not our own, but left to us from the holy moments of others, a wealth so great and common that we never think of it, but which makes up fully half of all that we believe. We, to-day, believe, if we do believe, because others believed; and however much we may disbelieve at ordinary times, the great moment shows us pretty plainly that deep down we are in the Church of the European mind, and that we stand or fall, as souls, by that Church's revelation."

It is true that Mr. MASEFIELD is speaking here of a Christianity wider than the bounds of nationality. But we may paraphrase his words without injuring their meaning, and say the great moment shows us pretty plainly that deep down we are in the Church of the national mind. This national church is invisible. It is confined to no place and its grace is ministered by no exclusive order. But if invisible, it is none the less real—real enough to check the rivalries of the organised churches of the land with their competitive claims to pre-eminence, and to unite them in the common ambition that they may be the best of which they are capable for God and the people, each according to its own gift and calling bringing the wealth of its experience to enlarge the message and enrich the power of our national Christianity.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

CHRISTIAN STILL.

THE problems of religion, Professor Eucken tell us in his latest book, engaged his serious attention from early youth, impelled thereto by the darker aspects of life, and yet he could never feel at home in the Churches, nor did he ever think of devoting himself to the ministry. He chose philosophy as the calling of his life, and for its sake tried to keep the religious interest in the back-ground. But, in spite of himself, it would not be denied. He was continually brought back by his philosophical thinking to religion, and as constantly was faced by the further problem of the attitude towards Christianity that might and ought to be assumed by men of untrammelled convictions. And now he gives his answer to the question: "Can we still be Christians?"* No one, he surmises, will be altogether satisfied with his answer, which is bound to be largely a matter of personal feeling and individual attitude of mind. Many will think that too large a space is given to the philosophical disquisition, others, that he has not dealt definitely enough with questions of religious reconstruction. But for that, Professor Eucken holds, the time has not yet come. The immediate need is for a clear statement of the main direction of the search, a first sketch of the lines on which the new world of religious thought is to be constructed. What the result will be and to what further tasks it may lead, only the future, he declares, and the united work of many minds can show.

The position thus taken up is that indicated in Professor Eucken's Essex Hall Lecture on "Religion and Life," and more fully in the little book on "Christianity and the New Idealism" (in Harper's "Library of Living Thought"), a translation of the third edition of the lectures on the chief problems of present-day religious philosophy, to which a new chapter was added on "The Conflict over Christianity To-day." As to the main position of the permanent basis of a spiritual faith, we are in this new book on the same ground as in the larger work on "The Truth of Religion," which is now available for English readers in Dr. Tudor Jones's translation. What we have here is a re-assertion of the fundamental truth of universal religion, that life means for us life of the spirit, which has in itself a sufficiency which overcomes the world, and has it because it is life in God. Man in himself, as he enters into the deeper meaning of his experience, becomes aware of the greater Life, the supreme Unity of the Spirit, by which his own life is enfolded, upheld, and quickened, and thus he knows himself to be with God, who is for ever in all and over all, in the working out of a divine purpose in his life. That we take to be Professor Eucken's conception of universal religion, and this conviction is to be held by us, he urges, with a new firmness and with fresh insight, through a more determined grappling with life as a whole, entering yet more deeply into its spiritual meaning, and thus achieving a new advance for mankind. So only can we gain once more a sense of unity in life, which is so sorely needed at the present time, a unity which goes deeper than all external interests and aims, to the very centre of our spiritual being in God.

But this advance we are to make as Christians still, for so we stand in the true line of spiritual development, with the inspiration of a great history behind us, working out to larger issues that secret of life, which Christianity was the first to make clear to the world. The supreme worth of the soul, the obligation of righteousness, the power of redeeming love, the grace of God quickening to new and purer life, these central facts of religious experience Christianity has most firmly grasped and most clearly interpreted to the world; and so as Christians, Professor Eucken affirms, we have our surest hold upon the secret of life, and are to press forward, and by the good providence of God to be led forward to fresh achievements of the Spirit, which alone can overcome the world. As Christians then, but not in the exclusive sense of the Churches, nor with any retention of the old dogmatic forms of belief. The doctrines, for instance, of the incarnation of God in Jesus Christ, and the sacrifice of his atoning death, as stated by the Church, are clearly no longer tenable. The truth, which they partially expressed, must be restated in terms of universal spiritual experience, on the basis of the collective life of mankind. And as to the Churches, neither the Catholic, with its exclusive claims, its sacrifice of independent manhood to the Church, its magnifying of the institution at the expense of living faith in God, nor yet the Protestant, as it is in Germany to-day, has the capacity, in Professor Eucken's view, to lead the necessary spiritual advance. Protestantism he regards as at present including two distinct and irreconcilable types of religion, and he is uncompromising in his demand for the separation of Church and State, which would lead to the further separation of parties into more natural religious connections. This he urges, not as an end in itself, but as required, to open the way for a complete veracity of religious life, without which it is vain to look for any advance in spiritual insight and power. Incidentally he makes an interesting plea for a broader conception of theological education. While rendering all honour to the Bible, he suggests that too large a place is given to philological and historical studies, while clearly, it cannot be right to regard the mastery of Hebrew as more essential than a thorough familiarity with the social problems of the time. Religion must be reborn from life as it is in the world to-day, in the whole range of its interests and needs, not through any theoretical attempt at doctrinal restatement alone, but by actual living, in the power of the spirit, and it is as Christians that we can and must live out that true life, as free men, with new energy of faith, and with confidence and hope, because it is not of ourselves alone but of God. Thus we are left, not with a clearly defined programme, but with a call of the Spirit to higher life, in obedience to the Highest.

SNOWDROPS.

IF houses wherein men live and the ways they daily tread take unto them sometimes the conditions of those they harbour and uphold, kind hearts must always have throbbed among the arbours of the old garden around Melysette's home. Even in the early February days, the sun seems here to diffuse a more benign and genial warmth than elsewhere. His conscious gladness in the recovery of some of his former power brightens the places where the moist soil bares its bosom to his caress, or is it because of the rich voice that comes forth through the open French window and stirs the song of the blackbird and wren?

"There is a gentle gleam when the dawn is nigh,
That sheds a tender light in the eastern sky;
When we see that light we know
That the noontide soon will glow;
Oh! such the light I know that's in my true love's eye.

There are mem'ries of the past which we all love well,
The present rings its chime like a silver bell;
But the future, all unknown,
Has a music of its own,
For the promise of its tone can all excel."

* Können wir noch Christen sein? Von Rudolf Eucken, Leipzig: Veit & Co., 1911. Price, M. 3.60; bound, M. 4.50.

And are the flowers listening? Few plants are awake with open blossom, and of those, the winter aconite has her shining yellow head too fixed in contemplation of her large Elizabethan green ruffles to heed the tender notes. The winter heliotrope is too busy wafting its rich fragrance from panicles of pink-mauve heads, making much of the time when fragrant blooms are rare. The huddled primroses in the border are too timid to think of aught but frost and their safety. The wistful periwinkle, out of whose eyes all positive interest has been washed away save the inextinguishable power of hope, is too forlorn. But one flower does not miss a note. The snowdrops listen, and all their bells have stopped ringing and are hanging hushed to hear the voice they love.

There was a close sympathy between the snowdrops and Melysette. Among all the precious gifts of earth, do any wield such ceaseless sway over the human heart as flowers? Their instinct of relating themselves to certain human moods, of intimately attaching themselves as causal agents to trains of thought and feeling, have rendered them of invaluable service to poets, and capable of filling no mean part in the life of ordinary folk.

Each flower produces a psychological effect, all its own, upon the beholder who is also a lover, through some subtle power resident in colour, fragrance, shape, or behaviour. A waft of scent from cowslips or freesias liberates one from the bondage of the present; and at once the city walls vanish, and a swift steed carries the wight over the cropped turf of the windy uplands, or over more distant prairies where the swish of pampas grasses is heard against the knees, and whirr of birds in flight, and bark of wolf and the leopard's leap. Place a carnation of deep crimson in another's hand, and at once she moves an Eastern princess through gay courts, where plashing fountains, passionate music, and murmurs of eloquent lovers mingle their sounds in one fine, strong dream. And let a raceme of harebells touch your cheek, and the sun pales his light, and on a glade moonlit, with silent steps, a train of winged fairies will dance to a melody that will haunt your ears with its sweetness, as the vision of the shadowy blossom of their dim hair will hold your eyes.

The snowdrop was Melysette's flower. It was her token. She herself had been born in February, the time of the "pale virgins, February maids"; and her child was also born in February, the girl-child who had wrought so wondrous a change in the mother, and turned the restless, eager, intense modernist into a mild, mediæval madonna. She knew the snowdrop, as Burne-Jones knew the sunflower, by heart. "Do you know what faces sunflowers have?" asks Burne-Jones. "How they peep and peer, and look arch and winning, or bold and a little insolent sometimes? Have you ever noticed their back-hair, how beautifully curled it is?" Melysette, in similar way, had scanned every pure line of green that streaks the white of the first snowdrop's inner leaves. She had minted the gold of its pollen into every coin current in her realm of dreams. The snowdrop was a magic talisman unto her; exercising a distinct spell, but related to nothing sensuous or material. Who can lift up and peer into the pure-white bell, without receiving a suggestion of something unearthly, of something materialised but for a moment, and soon to dissolve away? Who can escape the hint of asphodels that cast no shadow where they grow in their native clime, nor bend beneath the feet that tread them down? Are they not phantoms of a reality that hath its home elsewhere? Do they remain close to the soil after we have turned our back, or after dark? In Melysette's mind they were always associated with another world, an association which may be set forth only by reference to the Platonic theory of pre-existence. She was not of those who have drunk so deeply of the waters of Lethe as to entirely forget their native land. She had never lost the intimation of the soul's immortal home, sung by Wordsworth in his enduring ode. She was ever hovering on the borderland of remembrance. Sometimes she could almost see its ethereal spaces clothed in living beams, and almost hear its inaudible harmonies. Certain moods of nature which hold the body in the trance of bliss at its beauty, enabling the Dweller to see into the life of things, were so many barks to carry her to the shore of conviction. Certain movements of music heard from afar—the sounds rising out of and dying into the crepuscular silence; certain poems written by those similarly "touched with mystic gleams, like glimpses of forgotten dreams" would disengage dim recollections, baffling, elusive, yet ever on the verge of moulding themselves out of the mist into actual, arresting, and definite memory.

Into these experiences always came the thought and vision, as it were, of a once familiar companion, of an intimate sister of the spirit, still bound to her by indissoluble affinities. It was as though they had known and loved each other for æons. A sense of hunger for a presence that had once made itself indispensable, would follow in ineffable yearning this silent communion. And this link with the unseen ever helped her from becoming immersed in the concerns of the moment, as one who has hostages in heaven. It gave concrete form to aspiration after the undefinable good.

"And tho' within it no birds sing,
And tho' no pillar'd house is there,
And tho' the apple boughs are bare
Of fruit and blossom, would to God
Her feet upon the green grass tread,
And I beheld them as before.

There comes a murmur from the shore,
And in the place two fair streams are,
Drawn from the purple hills afar,
Drawn down into the restless sea;
The hills whose flowers ne'er feed the bee,
The shore no ship hath ever seen,
Still beaten by the billows green,
Whose murmur comes unceasingly
Unto the place for which I cry."

Sometimes, in response to her desire, the familiar solace would come. A face of surpassing beauty would shape itself out of the void, and upon the inner ear would fall the accent of a voice of bewitching tenderness, and the tapering fingers would hold what seemed like a white peerless snowdrop. "Our token" was their joint name for it. And with the vision, a great peace would flood Melysette's whole being. Once a strange promise of a closer and more constant companionship was given, the nature of which was made known to her only when the hopes of motherhood began to dawn upon her. It was during this period that a strange smile was witnessed wreathing Melysette's oval face where she sat in church. Our vicar, who courageously attempts to solve all the problems of life within the space of a quarter of an hour snatched from a lengthy and ornate service, was explaining how "the Divine Creator by an act of volition calls out of nothingness a new and freshly created soul to inhabit the unborn body, wherein it is destined to undergo its trial for an immortal life in either beatitude or banishment." "The dear old Bathybian!" she afterwards called him.

The song has ended, and through the folding doors she comes out into the sunshine carrying her child. She stoops to pick a flower and places it in her child's hand. The babe looks out upon the world, with eyes that remind one of that other child who gazes from the canvas of the Sistine Madonna, with a gaze far beyond the spectator and into illimitable distances behind. Then she turns round in her mother's arms, and their eyes look long into each other, and at length they bend toward each other, like Botticelli's angels, and kiss a slow silent kiss, as lovers kiss in heaven. And the snowdrop trembles in the child's hand, while those at their feet ring out their soundless music to hide the secret which they share.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

[Under this heading writers discuss freely from their own point of view living problems of Religion, Ethics, and Social Reform, but the Editor does not assume responsibility for the opinions expressed.]

STRIKES.

STRIKES are a method whereby organised labour seeks to gain for itself supposed advantages of better working conditions, increased wages, and power of control. They are significant of the growth of democratic self-consciousness, of discontent, relating to the state of labour exchange, of vague aspirations after a higher and more balanced life. They proceed on the basis of what may be called collective individualism. They are anti-social in that they tend to disorganise society, and to disregard the claims of the whole, in favour of a part. They are frankly and professedly selfish in their operations; no society strikes save in the hope of individual gain. Strikes are a method of industrial warfare in which oppositions are accentuated and lines of cleavage made more distinct. They are a disruptive force and provocative of enmities. They savour of physical and material war, and all the barbarisms of a crude civilisation. In principle, they are a legitimate protest against unwelcome conditions of labour, and an attempt to establish equity in industrial matters. In practice, they involve appeals to passion, and generate a temper that is subversive of social order and national unity. In olden days, highwaymen presented pistols and blunderbusses at the heads of supposed capitalists and property-owners, and demanded the delivery of goods. It was a pleasant occupation, but not without its risks, and in the defence of Richard Turpin, Esq., much may be entered. To make carriage-folk disgorge their oft-times ill-gotten wealth, was a praiseworthy pursuit; but the method got on the nation's nerves, and led to reprisals and to spectacles at Tyburn. Strikes are the blunderbuss which labour with polite zeal puts to the head of the capitalist. As to the holding of the property in dispute, much may be said in favour of the blunderbuss holder, but there are signs that the nation is tired of so nerve-racking a process, and that steps will be taken to obviate disagreeable experiences of that kind.

It may be worth while to examine some of the fundamental ideas upon which strikes proceed. The social combination of workers to secure common ends is supposed to be a perfectly legitimate thing. Organisation per se is a natural method of aggrandisement; but the legality or morality of any particular organisation depends partly on the end which is to be attained, and partly on the method of attainment. So the organisation which has for its end the acquisition of property may be of the highest moral and social value, but if the method adopted is that of looting, or burglary, or fraud, or murder, the developed social conscience revolts. That the workers should combine to secure their ends may be right or wrong doctrine; the morality depends on the end to be attained, and on the method of realisation. In dealing with strikes, we are discussing methods of realisation. The end for which the strikers work may or may not be right; every case has to be decided on its own merits. It is foolishness to believe that the strikers necessarily must be in the right. Strikes are usually the decision of unions, and they involve the cessation or the breaking of contracts. As between buyer and seller in an open market, there can be no question of strikes, unless buyer and seller are already in an organic relationship of contract-fulfilment. Where a union decides to strike, it is the duty of the minority members of the union to act loyally with the majority. But the morality of the strike will partly be determined by the nature of the contract binding the workers and their employers. To break a contract is a morally culpable thing, whether the parties be individuals or societies. Moral responsibility is not lost because of the combination or union. Individual moral responsibility is the foundation of social ethics, and cannot be outraged without the risk of social disintegration. The giving of notice to strike is a minimum duty binding on all concerned; to strike without notice may be effective so far as the end is concerned, but under the usual conditions of labour-contract it is a mean and dastardly thing so to act. Even in industrial warfare there is such a thing as "playing the game." The success of a strike depends on the complete stoppage of labour-supply, hence the adoption of what has been called "picketing." The giving of information regarding the genesis and progress of a strike cannot be accounted wrong; but, in practice, "picketing"—peaceful or otherwise—means intimidation, even where recourse is not had to physical force; and intimidation, whereby a man is hindered in the course of conduct which he and society agree is right, should be legally penal. Men are often driven into unions by fear of their fellow-workers; the kind of tyranny which holds in labour circles, and which makes life a miserable thing for the minority, will probably disappear when the workers become civilised; no one can deny that there is much that is cruel and barbaric in their dealings with each other. Picketing, as it is practised, is often a piece of barbarism, and, in the interests of social order, cannot sufficiently be condemned. So far we have argued on the assumption that a strike affects only those who are immediately concerned, the workers and their employers. But most strikes have a social bearing. Society is so complex and inter-related that the disorganisation on any large scale of the labour market means the dislocation of other activities, and consequent social suffering. Because society as a whole may be affected, society—as represented in its government and by public opinion—has a right to say whether a strike should occur or continue. Strikes that affect the food-supplies and the travelling facilities of the people are an offence against the nation, and should be treated as such, even if it means the calling in of soldiery and the establishment of military discipline; for such strikes are a menace to higher well-being and destructive of the true socialistic temper.

As a method of settling labour disputes, strikes are a barbaric, clumsy, oftentimes cruel business. Oftentimes they seem to cost more than they are worth, and sometimes they seem to defeat the ends of the socialism which many of their originators profess. Strikes proceed on the assumption that one part of society is necessarily antagonistic to another part, but the right kind of progress depends on the well-being of society as a whole, and in the consideration of that well-being sympathy and mutual regard are prime factors. There is only one civilised, effective way of settling disputes, and that is by arbitration or by conference. Courts of award, arbitration, and appeal might be instituted whereby the stability of the social order would be maintained, and yet facilities be offered for the re-adjustments of industries and the settlements of commercial disputes. Cases there may be where strikes would be justifiable, but these surely are rare. Gentlemen who quarrel settle their differences, not by brute force or by the appeal to arms, but by law, or by social re-arrangements. Why should not a like procedure be the right thing for industrial quarrels? Strikes are but a form of civil war, and war, even in its most justifiable aspects, is an evil thing, bringing sorrow and confusion wherever it is waged. The only real hope for the advancement of society and the right settlement of disputes lies in the cultivation of practical religion. Sympathy rightly directed would render strikes unnecessary. The sympathy should be on both sides, for some folks talk as if all masters were brutes and all workers downtrodden saints. Much of the conflict between capital and labour follows from the system in which both masters and men find themselves, but sometimes the disputes are the outcome of misunderstandings and mere social antipathies. Systems are altered only by gradual evolution, and it is foolish to expect righteousness to be established by brutal revolution. Misunderstandings will disappear when unions allow men to come together in sympathetic conference. Antipathies will die down as soon as our common humanity has a chance to assert itself in love and mutual service. But, in any case, civilisation condemns the strike as a method of barbarism, only to be allowed as the last resort of baffled minds and manacled souls. The discontent that rightly may exist among the working classes can only be served in a religion of love. The unity that is vital and organic is from within. If society is to grow, it will not be by strikes and labour wars, but by the honest attempt to understand the whole situation, and to accommodate industrial conditions to the ends of happiness. The trouble is that the reigning ideals are bound up with material progress and the mere ownership of property. When people understand that it is not so much what men have as what they are that matters, then, perhaps, there will be the attempt on the part of those who are cultured and happy to help their less happily placed brothers and sisters to realise the better side of life under conditions of freedom and justice and peace. In the harmonic working together of the different classes of society, there will be the best guarantee of industrial quiet, for the peace that follows the pointing of the blunderbuss is a very treacherous kind of thing, and tends to the perpetuation of enmity.

BERGSON AND MARTINEAU.

SIR,—There are two important statements in Professor Jacks' interesting letter to which I did not refer in my former communication on the above subject, but which certainly demand attention. The first is: "In Martineau's chapter on 'Hedonism and Evolution' there is a most remarkable, though incidental, anticipation of Bergson's Evolution créatrice." I have not succeeded in discovering the grounds of the above statement, but I will quote a passage in which Martineau sums up his views on the subject:—"If the evolutionist means no more than that, in point of historic fact, Life first appeared in plant-form on this globe, and was followed by sentient types, passing by innumerable gradations from the most simple in organism and function to the present nature of man, he sets up an hypothesis consistent with the evidence at present within reach of the naturalist. But if he means that he has found, or can suggest, an adequate system of causation for working out this process from beginning to end, he overstates the strength of his hypothesis, which, meeting with a chasm in two places, is broken as a reasoned scheme into three pieces, empirically successive, but logically detached."—"Types of Ethical Theory," vol. ii. p. 401.)

M. Bergson thinks that he has found such "an adequate system of causation." How, then, does he bridge over the two chasms? By simply denying that they exist. The first chasm is the appearance of Consciousness on the planet, which Martineau says requires a new creative act. There is assuredly no anticipation of Bergson here, though, personally, I am inclined to think that on this matter speculations like Bergson's do go far towards spanning this gulf; and Martineau once took me to task for broaching this opinion.

The second chasm is the one I dwelt upon in my previous letter, viz., the entrance of Free-will, or the power of choice between two equally possible alternatives. Here, too, Martineau fundamentally differs from M. Bergson, for he maintains that the moral facts demand a new creation in the case of the human soul. For my own part, I think it is possible to conceive that the power of free choice is latent in the animal soul, but does not become clearly manifested till the animal has developed social and moral ideas; but even here Martineau regarded me as heretical. It is, then, I think, self-evident that Martineau's "two chasms" entirely remove even the faintest possibility of his philosophy ever developing into Bergsonianism.

This comes out more clearly in the second passage in Professor Jacks' letter: "Both Bergson and Martineau are pledged through and through to the doctrine of Freedom." If Professor Jacks had clearly realised that the word "freedom," when applied to human conduct, has got in M. Bergson's philosophy an essentially different meaning from that which it bears in Dr. Martineau's ethical and religious writings, he would not, I think, have dwelt so much on a merely verbal identity. M. Bergson leaves out of the meaning of this word precisely that factor which Martineau regarded as by far the most important element in its connotation, namely, the power of deciding in moral crises in favour of either of two equally possible courses. The word "freedom," when thus eviscerated, would in Dr. Martineau's view be quite inadequate to express the facts of man's moral and religious experience. Freedom, as a power to choose between selfish desires and the felt authority of the Father within us, forms the very corner-stone of each of the two great works on which Martineau's philosophical reputation rests. M. Bergson's philosophy may, perhaps, supersede that of Martineau; but to speak of the one as being in any real sense an anticipation of the other appears to me to do violence to recognised philosophical affinities.

M. Bergson is a highly original writer, but if there is any near relationship between his views and those of contemporary thinkers it is with the Hegelians (between whose view of "freedom," and that of M. Bergson there is a close family likeness) and certainly not with Martineau and the Libertarian Theists, that this distinguished thinker is most appropriately classed. But, after all, M. Bergson's philosophy must be pronounced unique; for his fascinating account of the Life-Impulse (Élan de Vie) is in striking contrast with the cold intellectualism of the Hegelian school.—Yours, &c.,

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me the use of your columns to make it known that invitations and programmes for the triennial meetings at Birmingham, April 16 to 19, have now been sent to all ministers and secretaries of congregations and of societies on the roll? If anyone who ought to have received them has not done so, I shall be much obliged if he will kindly let me know. And may I emphasise how essential it is that intimations of a desire for hospitality from those to whom it is offered should reach me not later than March 20?

All members of congregations on the roll of the Conference, whether delegates or not, are cordially invited to the meetings. They can obtain from me certificates entitling them to obtain return tickets for a fare and a third (minimum 1s.). It will be convenient that application for these certificates be made as far as possible through the secretary or some one representative of the congregation.

On previous occasions someone has written to me afterwards to say that he had been unable to obtain a ticket at the reduced fare, as the local station was without the necessary instructions from head-quarters. One regrets the annoyance to which friends have thus been subjected, but it may easily be prevented if they will take the precaution of inquiring a few days in advance at the station from which they intend to travel, and will at once notify the head railway office or me in case there is any difficulty.—Faithfully yours,

JAS. HARWOOD,

Secretary.

* * A CORRECTION.—We must apologise for a bad error at the close of Canon Lilley's article on Père Hyacinthe last week. In the quotation from Browning "divine legend" should, of course, have been "divine regard."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

TRUTH IN PARADOX.

Falling Upwards. By the Rev. F. W. Orde Ward, B.A. London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. 5s. net.

THE central idea of this racy book is that expressed in the Wordsworth quotation on the title page that "foundations must be laid in heaven." One needs a little patience to read Mr. Orde Ward. But he is worth it. If we did not know better we should say he was a very daring young man. Even if we were not otherwise informed we should guess from his extraordinary range of reading and fertility of quotation that his dash and vigour is due to another youth than that of fewness of years—the youth of a Peter Pan of Hope and Adventure that never grows up into a stale and shabby and disillusioned old age. We confess, as being yet in early middle age, that we should like to steal or share Mr. Ward's secret. His style is allusive, sudden, breakneck, breathless. It provokes and irritates by its perversities and paradoxes. He cavorts and prances, and strikes out brilliant irrelevances from the heels of his going. But let the reader hold on to the saddle with firm thighs if he knows how to ride such a mettlesome and capricious mount, or if not let him throw horsemanship and dignity to the winds and cling shamelessly to the mane; he will settle down in time, and all will be well. It will be a cross-country run and probably a longer way home than the old highways and bridle paths, but at least it is more exciting and vitalising and when he leaps from the creaking saddle, his eyes will be bright and dancing and his cheeks aglow with health and energy. What are the thoughts that have come to us in the ride? Many that we accept gratefully, many that we quarrel with furiously but accept on account of their provocativeness no less gratefully. "The Church has been secularised, when the world should have been consecrated." "We must not forget, the world has to conform to our thoughts, not our thoughts to the world"—a sentence cram-jammed with falsehood and with truth. "What shall we understand by Good, when we know that nothing ever was or is or will be good at all times and in all places and to all persons?" Here is a capital copy-book maxim for others than literary and artistic aspirants—"It is often a purple patch that covers without concealing the grossest kind of animalism or greed."

Indeed it is these sparks by the way that keep the reader alert and attentive. "There is a knowledge that darkens, no less than a knowledge that illuminates, and we pay a heavy price for our civilisation." The writer is often extremely happy and suggestive in his illustrations. Here is one: "Special combinations, we are told, due to the presence (and almost imponderable traces) of foreign bodies give certain chemical compound substances their aptitude for phosphorescence. In a state of perfect purity they never shine under the action of light. In like manner the presence or admixture of evil appears to operate benignly, by eliciting beautiful moral qualities. The alloy offers an advantage to the soul, that utilises the encroachment of a hostile intruder, and makes the invasion opportunity for self-development through self-crucifixion." The same thought recurs: "Achievement too frequently works itself out as the greatest conceivable disaster, while disappointment might have been an ethical coronation."

This might be said to be the central idea of the book, that Christ is triumphant in agony, that the Key to the riddles of the Cosmos is a cross, that only through crucifixion is there true self-realisation and an entrance into the resurrection life of glory. The last words of the book are these: "Everything depends on the point of view, whether we consider life sub specie Christi, in the light of Christ, or sub specie mundi, in the light of the world. It has been well said, all takes its shape and colour and dimensions from the attitude and emotion with which we come. If we are afraid, the thing becomes our master. If we hope, it becomes our servant. If we love we find a good, if we hate we find an evil. Truth and untruth alike are magnified or minimised by the way in which we regard them. Evil only exists in its negative way, as something to be resisted and conquered, and by the process of religious transvaluation to be used as our servant. Sin, which poisons our happiness and even more than of others, while we chose it and indulge in it, can yet be compelled by repentance to bring forth honey as from between the ribs of death. And the fall perceived and confessed and lamented reveals the Cross of Christ and the atoning Love, and is a fall upwards."

THE "LEGITIMATE" CHURCH.

Divine Transcendence. By J. R. Illingworth, M.A., D.D. London: Macmillan & Co. 4s. 6d. net.

IN the opening chapters of this book Dr. Illingworth seeks to controvert the notion that the idea of immanence, so much insisted on of late, has rendered obsolete that of transcendence; and it will be generally agreed that he is right in holding that both ideas are essential to the Christian conception of God. But when he goes on to treat of religious authority as a reflection of divine transcendence, he takes up some very questionable positions. He maintains that this authority is vested in the Anglican, Roman and Greek Churches by virtue of their possession of the historic episcopate, and therefore that they only are the legitimate branches of the Holy Catholic Church. He admits, it is true, that the Holy Spirit works through churches which do not enjoy the historic episcopate, but he would have us believe that it does so with difficulty and less effect, and rather by way of condescension than of goodwill. It seems to us, however, that if the history of Christendom proves anything it is that the Holy Spirit has no such preference as Dr. Illingworth attributes to it, but bloweth where it listeth, making its presence felt with equal power through forms of the ecclesiastical government the most diverse. Our author is not in sympathy with the demand for the revision of the creeds. "The complete and final objection to this," he says, "lies in the divided condition of the Church [the Holy Catholic Church as above defined]. In the first place, the return from this state of division to one of communion is the necessary aspiration of all sincere Christians. And as long as the creeds which have come down from the undivided days of the Church are still common to its now estranged and separated branches, we have a formulated agreement in essential doctrine on which at least to found a hope of better days some time to come. Whereas if we in any way diminish the exactitude of this agreement we endanger the essential basis of future reunion, and to that extent defer its likelihood." Thus, it would appear, even the "damnatory clause" must remain in the Athanasian Creed until the reunited Church sees fit to remove it. The prospect of having to wait till then before any revision of the creeds takes place can hardly be welcome to sensitive minds, for whom the claims of veracity are at least as urgent as is the desire for reunion with the Roman and the Greek Churches.

FIVE BOOKS OF VERSE.

Forty-two Poems. By J. E. Flecker. London: J. M. Dent & Sons. 2s. 6d. net.

Magyar Poems. Selected and translated from the Hungarian by Nora de Vályi and Dorothy M. Stuart. London: E. Marlborough & Co. 2s. and 3s. 6d. net.

Helen of Troy and Other Poems. By Sara Teasdale. New York and London: Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.

The Poet's Calendar and Other Verses. By Margaret Macdonald. London: A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

The Masque of the Elements. By Herman Scheffauer. London: J. M. Dent & Sons. 3s. 6d. net.

ALL genuine poetry has its source in the primal and creative impulse whereby the flower and the star are born. It may treat of sorrow and death, of the illusions and failures of men, of the weariness and vanity of love; but its chief concern is, after all, with the immortality of life and beauty. Even the attempt to make of woven rhymes a "dull narcotic numbing pain" is but another effort of the vital forces at work under the cloak of grief, and a new vision is the reward of that striving against inertia. But the combination of this supreme inspiration with the power of adequate and rhythmical expression is exceedingly rare, as we are reminded again and again in reading Mr. Flecker's "Forty-Two Poems." They are, as far as technique is concerned, almost invariably perfect; indeed, we have not for a long time come across verses by a modern poet so spontaneous and felicitous in expression, so devoid of those sensational devices by which lesser poets often strive to arrest our attention when real emotion is lacking. But the wistful sadness of a soul eternally haunted by an ideal which it cannot quite grasp, and in which it does not believe, can be detected in every line.

"If things so lovely are," he asks, "why labour still

To dream of something more than this
I see?

Do I remember tales of Galilee,
I who have slain my faith and freed my will?"

Mr. Flecker, at present, beholds life through a veil of pessimism, but whenever the veil lifts, as it surely must, he will, we think, give us stronger and more enduring work.

The note of pessimism also characterises many of the "Magyar Poems" which have been translated from the Hungarian by Miss Stuart, and Miss Nora de Vályi, of Budapest. We can well understand it when we read the biographical notes included in the volume, to which they give an added interest. The men who wrote these poems seem to have drunk deep of the cup of sorrow. Many of them devoted their lives to patriotic aims which were not realised; some endured great hardships and the bitterness of exile; and one, Sándor Petőfi, was tormented—unnecessarily, as it turned out, for he was killed during the revolution of 1848—by the thought that he would die among his pillows "like a bloom whose root the canker gnaws." There is a "Hymn" by Ferencz Kölcsey, in which the divine aid is invoked for the Motherland with a proud pathos which is very stirring, especially when we recall the "Vanitas Vanitatum" by the same writer, and the "Ode" by Dániel Berzsenyi is similarly characterised by a fine religious spirit. We are indebted to the translators for giving us this valuable selection from the poetry of Hungary in an English dress.

Miss Teasdale is a genuine singer, and her poems on Sappho, Erinna, Guenevere, and Helen of Troy are full of melodious lines, and a very acute perception of the devastating emotions which have made their names immortal. She has the lyrical impulse, and breaks forth every now and then into exultant little songs that ring as true as the trills of the mavis in Hawthorne time. The only complaint we have to make in respect of her really charming verses is that they harp too much on one string, and are too monotonously egotistical. The love that never finds satisfaction may need expression as much as the love that ends in joy, but if its sorrowful complaint is kept up too long it becomes selfish and morbid, and, if we may be quite frank, boring. But sometimes, we suspect, the unrequited passion is artificially stimulated even when it is almost ceasing to exist, lest the inspiration of the poet which so largely depends upon it should cease also. Perhaps this is unkind, but we should value Miss Teasdale's gifts more highly if they could find a wider range, and if she were a little more cognisant of the "still sad music of humanity" outside the limited sphere in which her troubled heart finds expression.

The author of "The Poet's Calendar" is not afflicted with insurgent emotions, and her delicate verses have the quiet charm of water-colour drawings. She loves the "low hills," the healing power of Nature's silence, the grey and gold of an autumn landscape where "tracts of maiden birch and pine" slope down to a silver lake. Once or twice she touches upon the more poignant realities of life, as in "The Childless Wife" and "The Dead Lover," but she is really at her best amid green woodlands and fields silvered by the moon, where the tumult of the world is never heard.

Mr. Scheffauer's "Masque of the Elements" is, perhaps, the only one of the five books of verse under review which has in it the authentic thrill of genuine poetry springing from the deep sources of life which are alone creative. It really deserves an article to itself, for although the theme strikes one as being too ambitious, as well as too remote from the experiences of common humanity, the author has certainly succeeded in giving an intelligible and arresting interpretation of the great cosmic drama. He has tried to describe, not the passing of the seasons, but the tremendous changes that are brought about by Creation and Dissolution before the background of Time and Space. Instead of the joys and sorrows of men and women, we have the birth and decay, and then the re-birth, of suns and planets. Instead of the flowers of the meadow and the familiar alternations of day and night, we have the flash of meteors and the endless recurrence of life and death through interminable cycles—forces that follow and destroy each other like the serpents in the ancient symbol. The songs of the Sun, Moon, Earth, and the four elements are introduced by prose passages which frequently attain a high level of beauty, and should really be chanted aloud, and the book may be described as a sincere attempt on the part of a man of genuine poetic imagination to rise above the egotism which turns every individual sorrow into a sonnet, and pierce the eternal mystery which lies behind the unending avatars of Beauty.

THE LIFE OF PARACELSUS. By Anna M. Stoddart. London: John Murray. 10s. 6d. net.

THIS account of Theophrastus von Hohenheim, better known as Paracelsus, which was only completed just before Miss Stoddart's lamented death, will appeal chiefly to readers of Browning. The hero of the book was, indeed, one of the brilliant figures of the Renaissance, and a protagonist in the modern study of medicine. The writer, however, makes no claim to special scientific knowledge or original research, and her book is a popular narrative based chiefly on the results of recent German work. Paracelsus has many things to his credit besides his reliance upon experiment and experience. He was an indefatigable traveller. He was the first to lecture in German, in face of much opposition from a world which still identified learning with Latin. He won the friendship of Erasmus by his medical skill. He encouraged his students to go to Nature as better than many books, "where the apothecaries are the meadows, valleys, mountains, and forests, from whom we receive supplies for our apothecaries." These things, and many others, far outweigh the crudities and superstitions which still lurked in his mind, and dissolve the mists of prejudice and false legend which have obscured his fame. Paracelsus was a deeply religious man, but he was too independent to take sides with the Church against the Reform or with the Reform against the Church. "It is a sin against the Holy Ghost," he wrote in one of his later discourses, "to say: the Pope, Luther, Zwingli, &c., are the Word of God, or speak to us from Christ, or are they who represent Christ, are His prophets, are His apostles: he who holds and esteems their discourse as the Word of God sins against the Holy Ghost. . . . Thou hearest not what Christ says, but only what they say." Like many other men of science, whose interest lies outside the conflicts of rival systems of belief, he had real insight into the spiritual essence of Christianity: "Love and faith are one, for love comes through faith and true Christianity is revealed in love and in the works of love."

LANDMARKS IN FRENCH LITERATURE. By G. L. Strachey. London: Williams & Norgate, Home University Library, 1s. net.

It is harder to write a small book than a big one. Some of the primers which tormented our school-days remain to remind us of the fact. Many of them were little more than catalogues of information, often admirably arranged, usually terribly dull. History and literature treated in this way never throb with human interest and become for the learner mere exercises in memory. Mr. Strachey's volume on French Literature in the Home University Library is of a very different order. It is not overcrowded with dates and names; the material is admirably selected and arranged; and the style and literary judgments are both so distinguished that wider knowledge will only deepen the reader's appreciation. There are of course places where we hold our judgment in suspense or imagine that Mr. Strachey is riding some hobby of his own too hard. Many readers are likely to feel that Racine is defended and extolled a little too elaborately for a volume of this size. For ourselves we regret the rather unaccountable omission of Calvin in the majestic procession of French prose. M. Faguet gives him an honourable place in his volume of sixteenth century studies, while the editors of the recent facsimile of the 1541 edition of the "Institution de la Religion Chrestienne" speak of it rightly as "l'un des plus nobles et des plus parfaits chefs-d'œuvre de notre littérature." These small blemishes, however, only help to emphasise the shining qualities of Mr. Strachey's achievement. It is one of the best short histories of any national literature which it has been our good fortune to read.

ARCHITECTURE. By W. R. Lethaby. London: Williams & Norgate. Home University Library. 1s. net.

For the amateur, architecture is among the noblest of hobbies, and, unless he be also a collector of books, one of the least expensive. A book which would give him a survey of the whole field and emancipate him from the rather insular methods and nomenclature of the Gothic revival has long been needed. Mr. Lethaby has filled the gap with this admirable historical essay, which he describes as "an introduction to the history and theory of the art of building." "Good architecture," he tells us, "is masterly structure with adequate workmanship." This emphasis on structure runs through all his discussion of the subject and keeps his suggestive treatment of ornament from any taint of prettiness or the love of merely surface effects. It accounts also for the space devoted to Egyptian and Greek building, and for his coldness towards that of the Renaissance, which he describes rather severely as "the art of scholars, courtiers, and the connoisseurship of middlemen." Readers of Mr. Lethaby's book on "Medieval Art" will remember how he can make his words flash and glow with the spirit of beauty he is attempting to describe. The same rare and delightful quality meets us continually in these pages. We can only find space for one passage to illustrate what we mean. It is a description of the spirit of Gothic art. "It would be a mistake," he says, "to try to define it in terms of form alone; it embodied a spirit, or aspiration, an age. The ideals of the time of energy and order produced a manner of building of high intensity, all waste tissue was thrown off, and the stonework was gathered up into energetic functional members. These ribs and bars and shafts are all at bowstring tension. A mason will tap a pillar to make its stress audible; we may think of a cathedral as so 'high strung' that if struck it would give a musical note."

FIFTY YEARS OF WORK WITHOUT WAGES. By Charles Rowley. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 12s. 6d. net.

POSSIBLY Mr. Rowley is a poorer man in this world's goods because of the Ancoats Brotherhood and the invincible enthusiasms which have inspired his life; but during his fifty years of work he has earned the wages of friendship and public esteem and a fair retrospect such as fall to the lot of only a few of those who are rightly called benefactors. The story of the Work and the "Wages" is told in this handsome book with its wealth of delightful illustrations. It is written with the frank egotism which disarms criticism, and that effervescent enjoyment of life which has made it impossible for other men to deny Mr. Rowley their friendship or to refuse his requests. They are all here, Ford Madox Brown, Burne-Jones, William Morris, Frederick Shields, Walter Crane and the rest. It is a record of which Manchester may well be proud, for Mr. Rowley has always put his friends to noble use in the pursuit of civic aims. There is nothing quite like the Ancoats Brotherhood anywhere else, so independent of the cleavage of religious and political parties or so evenly compounded of artistic ideals and democratic vistas. If it owes its chief inspiration to the writings of Ruskin and Morris that in no way detracts from the originality of its founder. Mr. Rowley has actually done what most of us only dream of doing, and few readers will be so churlish as not to respond to the happiness in his achievement, which greets us like morning sunshine in every page of this book.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.
Edited by T. H. Darlow. London:
Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.

WE could hardly expect the Bible Society to keep its big "find" to itself, and had it done so a few students of literary origins would have been loud in their blame. Editor and publisher have done their best to whet our appetite, but the handsome volume with its cousinly resemblance to Mr. Nutt's "Tudor Translations," does not allure us when we have only to reach out a hand to take down "The Bible in Spain" from our shelves. The Borrow who writes these official letters with their pious phrases is not the strange adventurer of the imagination whom we know, any more than Charles Lamb at work on his stool in the India Office is the real Elia. If his employers had known what strange and splendid use Borrow was afterwards to make of the material which they helped him to collect, they would have been more than surprised and not a little dismayed. In the letters from St. Petersburg, which occupy less than a fifth of the volume, we are on new ground, and for any future account of the activities of the Bible Society they will supply valuable material. But we must not push our prejudice against unnecessary books so far as to blind us to the human qualities of these letters, though it is the author's own fault if he has made it hard for us to care for him in his less inspired moments. There are enthusiastic Borrowians who will welcome every line of them, and bestow upon this volume the deferential affection which paper, print, and binding conspire to invite. For readers with short lives and little leisure we would prescribe the more quintessential joys of Borrow at his best.

Few sermons survive the ordeal of print better than those of Professor F. G. Peabody. His new volume, "Sunday Evenings in the College Chapel" (London: Constable & Co. 5s. net.), contains sixteen sermons preached to students at Harvard. They have the charm of scholarly quietness and chastened speech, but otherwise they are not in the least academic. Everywhere there are the marks of earnest Christian conviction and a strong desire to help the hearer to face the real difficulties of life. Such sermons are College preaching at its best, because they never forget to be simple or to remind men who spend their days among books that the human need and the divine answer are everywhere the same.

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

A NEW batch has been added to Everyman's Library which brings the number of volumes issued by Messrs. Dent & Sons in this popular series up to 600. The books cover a wide range of subjects, and include, in the classical section, Plutarch's "Moralia," translated by Philemon Holland, and "The Muses' Pageant," by Miss W. M. L. Hutchinson, an attempt on wholly original lines, which will be completed in four volumes, to combine as in a pageant the myths and heroic tales of ancient Greece; in romance, William Morris's "Life and Death of Jason," and the Arthurian Tales and Chronicles represented by Wace and Layamon; in fiction, Goethe's prose masterpiece, "Wilhelm Meister," with Carlyle's introduction; "The Blithedale Romance," by Hawthorne, which tells the story of the communist experiment at Brook Farm; and "Childhood, Boyhood, and Youth," by Tolstoy. Two important books from the point of view of theology and philosophy are included, namely, "The Signature of all Things; with other Writings" by Jacob Boehme, with an introduction by Clifford Bax, and Descartes' "A Discourse of Method and Meditation on the First Philosophy," translated by Professor John Veitch. For the antiquarian there is Stow's "Survey of London," that famous account of Elizabethan London which was first written in 1598, and then added to, "with divers rare Notes of Antiquity," in 1603. This will be an admirable companion to the "History of Queen Elizabeth's Reign," five volumes, which completes Froude's "History of England." To many one of the most welcome additions will be "The Invisible Playmate," "W. V., Her Book," and "In Memory of W. V.," by William Canton. These tender and poignant studies of child-life have been gathered for the first time, by the author's consent, into a single volume.

LITERARY NOTES.

MESSRS. PUTNAM'S have in preparation a complete edition of the prose works of Zwingli, edited by Professor S. Macaulay Jackson. Professor Jackson is the editor of the same publishers' series of "Heroes of the Reformation," in which his own memoir of Zwingli appeared. The first volume of the works is announced for the spring.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN are publishing a volume of lectures by the Rev. William Temple, Headmaster of Repton, entitled "The Kingdom of God." The lectures were delivered at Cambridge under the auspices of the Cambridge Christian Evidence Society.

MESSRS. HEINEMANN have in preparation, among other books, Mr. John Galsworthy's first book of verse, "Wild Oats: Moods, Songs, and Doggerels"; "War and its Alleged Benefits," by J. Novikov, vice-president of the International Institute of Sociology, with a preface by Norman Angell. "The Life of Frederick Nietzsche," by his sister, Frau Foerster-Nietzsche; and the first volume of an English version of the novels of Dostoevsky, translated from the Russian by Mrs. Garnett.

A NEW volume by Mr. Edmund Gardner entitled "Dante and the Mystics," tracing the influence upon Dante of St. Augustine, the Dionysian treatises, St. Bernard, Richard of St. Victor, and the Franciscan mystics, will shortly be published by Messrs. Dent & Sons. "Socialism and Character," by Miss Vida D. Scudder, the translator of the letters of St. Catherine of Siena, is also announced by the same firm for publication at the end of the month.

THE Life, Lectures, and Essays of Professor W. Robertson Smith, in two volumes, edited by J. Sutherland Black and George Chrystal, are announced for early publication by Messrs. A. & C. Black. The "Life" is the official biography, and contains numerous illustrations from paintings and photographs. The volume of "Lectures and Essays" includes reprints of all Professor Smith's scientific papers contributed to the Proceedings and Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, as well as of many of his less accessible papers published in various periodicals.

MR. A. C. FIELD has just issued "The English Agricultural Labourer," a small book by the Rev. A. H. Baverstock, which discusses some of the problems connected with the small holding and housing questions, and suggests a number of remedies for the fatal disease of rural stagnation. Mr. G. K. Chesterton has written an introduction.

THE address on "The Opportunity of the East," delivered by Dr. Estlin Carpenter at the Brahma Samaj Anniversary, at Essex Hall, on January 25, will be published in full as a supplement to the next issue of the Christian Commonwealth on February 28.

WE understand that the Prologue, recited by Mrs. Brown Potter, at the Indian play, "Buddha," which was performed at the Court Theatre this week, was written by Mr. Harrold Johnson.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK announce that they have in the press a new study of the "Later Isaiah," by Professor T. K. Cheyne. In this book which will be called "Mines of Isaiah Re-explored," the author returns to the North Arabian theory which has played such a large part in his recent criticism. He endeavours to show that the current views of the "Liberation" of the Jewish exiles need much rectification, and that the "Liberator" was not the Persian King Cyrus, but a successful North Arabian adventurer; also that the next generation after the author of the Prophecy of Consolation did not know anything of a general release of the Jews in Babylon. Among his other results is the discovery that the Israelites worshipped a small Divine Company under a supreme director, This has been long certain to the author, and he believes it has now been confirmed by the Jewish papyri found at Elephantini.

IN the March number of The Highway, the organ of the Workers' Educational Association, there is to be an article from the pen of the Rt. Hon. Sir John Gorst on "The Failure of National Education." The writer attacks the national system as a "waste of money and energy"; he attacks "higher education" as well as "cramming" and the examination system. The article seems calculated to provoke considerable criticism from educationalists throughout the country.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

JOHN WYCLIF.

As time went on a number of people gathered round St. Francis and wished to live as he did. They gave all their money to the poor and went about preaching and helping people. They called themselves "the brothers" or friars, and from

St. Francis being their teacher, the world called them Franciscans. Very soon these Franciscans began to travel into other countries besides their own, and towards the end of the reign of King John a number of them crossed the sea to England and settled in London, where they found the people very poor and miserable, for you know John was a bad King who squeezed all the money he could out of the people, and never thought of trying to do them any good as King Alfred did all his life long. These friars who came over first were very good men, who spent all their lives in helping the poor and sick, cheering those who were dying, and begging others to give up their sins and lead a better life. But after a while, when these first friars were dead and others took their place, things were changed. The others began to envy the rich monks who lived in their comfortable monasteries, and to wish that they had property themselves, and by degrees they built themselves monasteries, and used to go about begging money from people and selling them "pardons" from Rome for their sins. And they were hypocrites, because, while they pretended that they did it all for the good of the people's souls, it was really because they wanted the money themselves to build their fine monasteries, and live there comfortably eating and drinking while the poor people were starving. If St. Francis had been alive, how sorry and angry he would have been! By the time of Richard II., when Chaucer lived, the friars had grown so selfish and greedy that the people liked them no better than they liked the monks, and it was high time that some brave man spoke out and made English people trust to some better guide than these monks and friars and the Pope.

John Wyclif was a scholar of Oxford, and he is not much heard of until he came to be 40. Before then, it is likely that he spent his time in reading and studying (for he was a very learned man, as we shall see) and perhaps in going about among the poor people of his own village, called Wyclif, on the river Tees, and hearing how hardly they were treated by the Church—how they had to pay a certain sum yearly to the Pope, called "Peter's Pence"—how the priests made them pay when any of their relations died to have services (or "masses" as they were called) said for them, which the priests told them would let the souls of those who had died into heaven—and how they frightened those poor people by telling them that their sins would never be forgiven unless they bought pardons from Rome. All this Wyclif knew, and saw how hardly it pressed on the lives of the poor, who had enough to do to get their living as it was. And then, being a scholar, he could read the Bible (which was in Latin then, you must remember). And the more he read it, the more he felt sure that God meant it to teach us none of these things which the priests taught. It taught us that to be good is the only thing that God minds about; that prayers and services are of no use unless we love our neighbour and do as Christ told us; and that if we are really sorry for what we have done wrong, God will forgive us without our going to any priest or Pope and buying a "pardon."

Well, as soon as Wyclif came to see this clearly, he felt that he could not keep quiet about it—he must tell other people as well, so that they might shake themselves free from the monks and live more as God meant them to do. He preached in his own village of Lutterworth in Leicestershire against the monks and friars and bishops; he wrote little short books or sermons in English (which no priest had ever done before) and sent them round among his followers, and the poor people read them gladly, for all that the Bible said had been carefully kept from them by the monks, who only preached in Latin. He also sent out a number of preachers called the "poor priests" who taught as he did, and who used to gather the people together anywhere—in a market-place, or a churchyard, or a village-green, and speak to them of what was in the Bible, and of how they ought not to be afraid of the friars, but to show them they did not mean to obey them any longer. Last of all, he set himself to translate the Bible from Latin into English, so that everybody could read it and judge for themselves whether the monks were right or not. Just think how grateful we ought to be to Wyclif for doing this! He made it possible for everybody to live a good life and please God, and taught us that as long as we have a good conscience we need not be afraid of anyone living. As the verse says which I quoted for you last week, "He that hath clean hands and a pure heart" is the one who shall ascend unto the hill of the Lord and stand in His holy place.

Wyclif was not afraid of any one living, for he felt that he was doing right, and he had need of courage. For, of course, all that he taught and preached made the Pope and the monks very angry, and several times he was called up before a court of justice, and once was on the point of being put in prison; but just then, luckily for him, Edward III. died, and Richard II. came to the throne, and he stood up for Wyclif because the Pope had ordered England to pay a large sum of money, which King Richard thought was unjust.

John of Gaunt, too, who, you remember, was Chaucer's friend, was a friend of Wyclif also, because he did not like the friars, and so Wyclif fared better than he might have done. But when John of Gaunt thought that he was going too far in displeasing the Pope, he sent him a message to stop writing. Wyclif only said, "I believe that in the end the truth will conquer," and went on with his writing and preaching without being afraid of anybody. When he was getting old, he lived in his parish of Lutterworth, and he was such a good parson whom all the people were so fond of that it is thought Chaucer was speaking of him when he describes the country parson, who really tried to do his best, and taught "Christ's law and his Apostles twelve, But first he followed it himself." From what I have told you I daresay you see for yourselves that Wyclif was more like a Protestant than a Roman Catholic. We might almost speak of him as the first Protestant, and his followers were called—or rather nicknamed—Lollards, because of a curious kind of chant which they sang, such singing being called "lollen" in Holland, where it first began. You will see later on how these poor Lollards were persecuted by the Roman Catholics and sometimes even burnt alive. For the whole of England did not become Protestant till a long time after Wyclif's death, though it was he who first set it on the road to becoming so. Forty years after he died the Pope gave orders that his body was to be dug up and burnt, and the ashes scattered into the stream that ran past his house. This was done, and is it not wonderful to think that, just as the stream carried the ashes into the river, and the river carried them into the sea, and the sea carried them all round the world, so the words of this one man have come to be known all over the world, and the Bible which he translated is to be found thousands of miles away from England—in Canada, India, Australia, America, and all the world over? The Pope might think that by burning his body he had put an end to his work, but it was not so. And remember always that though Wyclif was a better man than the Pope, St. Francis, though he was a Roman Catholic, was as good a man as Wyclif, and if he had been alive he would have agreed with Wyclif in what he said about the friars, and he and Wyclif would have been like brothers. For it is always so with those who care first and foremost about doing right and not about getting things for themselves. They can understand each other all the world over, because they have "Clean hands and a pure heart."

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

HOW TO MOBILISE SOCIAL WORKERS.

A VERY good and instructive example of how to make the best of voluntary social effort over a large city area is to be found in the movements of the Liverpool Council of Voluntary Aid, which has been ably supplementing the Lord Mayor's appeal for social workers. A leaflet of a general character has been drawn up, giving, for the information of those who have the time or inclination to do some voluntary work, a short statement of the general forms of social service undertaken in the city. The Council has also deputed one of its number to be in regular attendance at its office once a week, to confer with potential workers.

* * *

Besides the general leaflet, the Council has also issued several on specific work, of which perhaps the most valuable is that on "Infant Care in Liverpool" (recommended at a conference of the local bodies interested in the subject), which, besides stating in clear and simple language what ought to be done immediately before and after the birth of infants, gives a list of the various official and voluntary institutions in the city, to which application may be made for assistance in maternity cases. The Council does all it can to encourage new and inexperienced workers to put themselves under the leadership of skilled practical workers, and, no less important, to take up the study of social problems at the School of Social Science in connection with the local University.

* * *

Liverpool and Birmingham have an honourable record in this matter, and it were much to be wished that other municipalities throughout the country would make similar efforts to train and concentrate effectively the forces of voluntary effort, of which there is still so much available in England, and which only too frequently through want of a little care and forethought is either neutralised or wasted.

HALF-TIMERS AND FULL-TIMERS.

A return issued by the Bradford Educational Authority of the number of children who have left school for full time employment whilst under 14 years of age shows that in 1911 there were 512 children under 14 years of age in full time employment, whilst during the year 48 children were given full exemption from school, and were in full time employment before they reached 13 years of age. Such statistics are a curious example of the inverted logic which so often leads to the waste of ability in the rising generation. The child of exceptional intelligence who reaches the 7th standard before the average time may have his exemption certificate, and go out to some occupation which in many cases, if not in most, effectually stops his love of study. Is it not the exceptionally intelligent child who should be kept on at school and encouraged to enter on a wider course of study?

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

It will be of interest to many of our readers to know that Dr. John Hunter, of Glasgow, will preach in his old pulpit at the King's Weigh House Church, Duke-street, Grosvenor-square, London, W., at the morning service on Sunday, Feb. 25.

THE eighth National Peace Congress will be held at Caxton Hall, London, on May 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18. On Tuesday, May 14, and Wednesday, May 15, there will be an Anglo-German Conference, presided over by Lord Courtney of Penwith. On Wednesday afternoon, May 15, Sir James Yoxall, M.P., will preside at an Educational Conference. On Thursday morning, May 16, Mr. A. Gordon Harvey, M.P., will take the chair at a conference on Commerce and War, a conference on Armaments and Labour being held in the evening, when the chair will be taken by Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P. Short papers will be contributed at the morning conference by Mr. Norman Angell, Mr. F. W. Hirst, editor of the Economist; and Dr. T. J. Lawrence, formerly Professor of International Law, Cambridge and Chicago Universities. On Friday, May 17, Sir John Macdonnell, C.B., LL.D., will preside at a conference on International Arbitration.

A COURSE of five lectures on "English Literature" will be given by Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., in Rosslyn Hill Chapel Room, Hampstead, as follows: Monday, Feb. 26, "Shakespeare's Mother"; March 4, "John Milton"; March 11, "The Style of the Poetry of the Eighteenth Century"; March 18, "Charles Lamb's Essays"; and March 25, "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came" (Robert Browning). The lectures will begin at 5.30 precisely. Admission to a single lecture, 2s., ticket for the whole course, 7s. 6d., family ticket for the whole course, £1 1s. These may be obtained from Miss A. M. Odgers, The Garth, North Finchley, N., and from Miss K. Shearman, Compton Leigh, Frognaal Gardens, Hampstead, N.W. The proceeds will be given to the Finchley Unitarian Church in aid of the Building Fund.

THE annual meeting of the Invalid Children's Convalescent Hospital Home (Mrs. Hampson's Memorial Home) Winfred House, Wray-crescent, Tollington Park, N., will be held at the Home on Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 28, at 5 o'clock. Mr. C. Fellows Pearson will preside, and the Home will be open to visitors for the inspection of the children's wards at 4.30.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—On Sunday, the 11th inst., the annual choir sermons were preached at Richmond Hill Church, when the minister, the Rev. W. J. Hawthorn Jones, occupied the pulpit morning and evening. The annual prize distribution and parents' tea party was held on Saturday, the 10th. The chair was occupied by Mr. Charles Smith. The minister distributed the prizes, and delivered an appropriate address, emphasising the importance of Sunday schools. A programme of music followed the address.

Bournemouth.—The Rev. V. D. Davis has written a letter to a Bournemouth paper repeating the remarks which he made during a recent morning service at his church on the subject of prayer, with special reference to the establishment of a better understanding between England and Germany. He had received an appeal issued by the Executive of the Society of Friends with the request that it might be read to his congregation. The appeal urged that all who believed in the Fatherhood of God should pray frequently and earnestly that the efforts of the rulers and statesmen who are endeavouring to bring about a lasting peace might be crowned with success. Mr. Davis commented on this appeal in the following words:—"What I venture to urge is that the prayer now required of all who believe in the Fatherhood of God is not a pleading with Him as to how He should order the mind of rulers and statesmen, but prayer with the whole energy of our being, not merely 'frequently,' but ceaselessly, for the better mind in ourselves. God will care for the ordering of His own good providence. We have to set ourselves to realise, not merely in feeling, but in conduct, what the Divine Fatherhood actually means and what it demands of us, if we are honest in our prayer, 'Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.' The living prayer will be in strenuous and faithful efforts for self-control, for justice, for mutual forbearance, for the insight of genuine sympathy, for generosity of feeling towards the people of other lands, for a true brotherhood among our own people, and in our disposition towards others and our dealings with them. We can all pray together, if we only will, in this very practical way, so that the sincerity of our feeling and of our conduct may more and more penetrate the life of our people, reaching, as we may trust, the mind and heart of rulers and statesmen with the rest, and further, in the special matter of this appeal, helping to kindle a like spirit of trust and brotherhood in the people of Germany. Such at any rate appears to me the immediate duty laid upon us all, according to our Father's will, a line of true endeavour, prayer which will be indeed 'a hand that catcheth hold on peace,' prayer which is something to be effectually done, by the grace of God, which He surely will not leave without an answer."

Edinburgh : St. Mark's Chapel.—On Sunday, February 11, the Rev. R. B. Drummond gave an address on "Charles Dickens," alluding specially to his influence as a moral teacher and social reformer. On the following evening, readings from the famous author's works were given in the church-hall by Mr. Drummond and Mr. Collingridge Barnett.

Hastings.—On Thursday, February 15, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, delivered a most interesting lecture on "A Free Catholic Church." The lecturer said that he refused to surrender the word "Catholic" to one branch of the Christian Church, and took it in the sense of "whole" and "universal." There were three possible lines of convergence, amalgamation, as amongst some of the Methodists, absorption as with the Roman Catholic Church, and independent lines of convergence such as were taking place amongst Liberal thinkers in all the churches. The scepticism of Huxley and Tyndall was dead now, and as faith was getting nearer to science so science was drawing nearer to faith. The New Reformation, he held, was not making for sectarianism and disunion but for union and catholicity. The chair was taken by the Rev. S. Burrows, and several questions were asked and answered at the close of the lecture.

Liverpool.—The annual meeting of the Liverpool Postal Mission was held on Saturday afternoon, February 17, at Ullet-road Church Hall, about 80 friends being present. By the kind invitation of Mrs. and Miss Holt the first half-hour was spent pleasantly over tea and conversation in the library, after which an adjournment was made to the large hall for the more formal part of the meeting, during which the Rev. J. Collins Odgers occupied the chair. The report shows an increase of work in the number of new applications, in the books lent and sold, in the tracts given, and in the parcels sent out, and the workers are convinced that the need for such a mission is as great as ever. Many new books have been added to the library, and are being circulated and read with interest. The balance sheet shows an increase of indebtedness to the treasurer, due partly to the purchase of new books. The Rev. R. Nicol Cross, of Southport, gave an interesting address, and after a vote of thanks to the hostesses, the speaker and the chairman, the meeting closed with the Benediction. The collection amounted to £20s. 7d.

Liverpool: North-End Domestic Mission, Hamilton-road.—The annual report of the North-End Domestic Mission contains a cheery and encouraging account by the Rev. J. L. Haigh, of the various activities connected with his work at Hamilton-road. It is declared that this winter has been the best of the series since the Mission was started, and credit must be given to the devoted workers for such an excellent result. The morning congregation is still not as good as might be wished, but the evening congregation nearly always comes up to, and sometimes exceeds, expectations. The junior classes of the Sunday school are crowded, and it has been found necessary to refuse admission to any more new scholars. "Everton is the most densely populated district in Liverpool," says Mr. Haigh, "and is of a Protestant character. I mean 'Protestant' in a local sense. To those who know Liverpool the word sums up all I need say; and so long as we are not branded 'Catholic,' in the popular acceptance of that term, we easily get our quota of the overflowing young life of the neighbourhood. To get the parents and guardians is always another question; and to retain this young life during its period of adolescence is one of the perpetual problems that faces Sunday-school workers, here and elsewhere. . . . We could fill a Sunday school blessed with double the accommodation of our building, and an infants' room three times the size of the present." The Monday evening concerts have been discontinued, owing to the counter-attractions of picture palaces, &c., in the neighbourhood, and a gymnasium has been started instead with excellent results, 40 members having joined at the outset. The Boys' Own Brigade (now under the captaincy of Mr. Haigh) Wednesday evening Recreation Society, Young Women's Club, Young Men's Club, Book Society, Ramblers' Society, &c., all report successful work, and the Summer Reading Circle, which has been studying one of Thomas Hardy's books, not only gives much pleasure but is gradually training its members in the appreciation of good literature founded on living and truly human experiences. In all these ways, and in the relief of the sick and destitute, the assistance of hard-worked mothers, and the providing of treats and excursions, the Mission is fulfilling its purpose and is receiving the cordial support of those who are anxious to see its sphere of usefulness extended.

London: Hampstead.—A neighbourhood meeting of the Women's League was held at Hampstead on the occasion of the annual meeting of the Rosslly Hill Chapel Women's Union on February 15. The chair was taken by the Vice-President, Mrs. Walter Bailly, in the unavoidable absence of Miss Edith Preston, who was subsequently re-elected as President for this year. There were present members from the branches at Brixton, Finchley, Highgate, Islington, Kentish Town, Stratford, and Walthamstow. After the annual report had been read and adopted, and the other necessary business transacted, Mrs. Sydney Martineau spoke on the recent developments in the work of the Women's League, and especially of the Fellowship Section, and the International Sub-committee with its "Guild of Friendship." She pointed out that there are many girls and women who have to leave home either for employment or study, and who may find themselves a long way from any church of Liberal Religion, or possibly may be in ignorance of one close at hand. The Fellowship Section aims at preventing this isolation; where the newcomer is near a church, the branch secretary, or some responsible member is informed of her arrival, so that she may be welcomed into the congregational life and made to feel at home there. Where the distance is too great, however, for this personal intercourse, friendly letters and information will lessen the feeling of separation. The Guild of Friendship is being formed for the benefit of girls of families belonging to the Liberal Religious movement abroad. By recommending boarding-houses, schools or private homes where they may reside, and by ensuring through the branches and also the central committee that they shall receive invitations to meetings that will interest them, the League can do much to strengthen the bond of sympathy with the Liberal Religious Movement abroad. At present, the scheme is limited to Hungary and Germany, but in time it is hoped that not only Colonial churches, but women's societies in Holland, Denmark, Switzerland, &c., will also be induced to join the International Union and make use of the Guild of Friendship. Miss Helen Herford spoke further on this subject, and afterwards some of the delegates present gave brief reports of the doings of their branches.

London: Peckham.—On the 15th inst. the Rev. George Carter, founder and for many years minister of the Peckham Church, celebrated his golden wedding by holding a reception in the Lecture Hall adjoining the church in Avondale-road, Peckham. A very large number of friends were present, and during the afternoon several congratulatory speeches were made and floral and other tributes presented by representatives of various bodies. These souvenirs included a handsome basket of flowers from old friends of Avondale-road Church, the presentation being made by Mrs. Cooley. Many friends from South London Unitarian Churches were present, including the Revs. W. G. Tarrant (Wandsworth), W. Chynoweth Pope (Lewisham), and Douglas Robson (Peckham), and the numerous messages of congratulation included one from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

Plymouth.—A service and public meeting to welcome the Rev. W. H. Burgess on his settlement at the Treville-street Unitarian Chapel was held on Saturday, February 17. Mr. A. G. Ellis presided at the meeting, at which Mr. A. Dufton spoke on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. J. Paton for the trustees. The Rev. R. H. V. Bloor, of Exeter, extended a welcome on behalf of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches, and gave the charge to the minister. The Rev. T. P. Spedding, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, gave the charge to the congregation. Mr. S. W. Wright brought greetings from the congregation at Devonport. The Rev. T. P. Spedding preached in the chapel on the following morning.

The McQuaker Trust.—The Missionary Minister employed by the McQuaker Trustees, the Rev. E. T. Russell, has presented a satisfactory report of his work during 1911. It is a record of numerous open-air services involving a great deal of travelling. In addition, he conducted services on 33 Sundays at Stenhousemuir and on 13 Sundays at Perth. He has also delivered numerous indoor lectures during the winter months and superintended the work of the Postal Mission. Mr. Russell

"You have to make up your mind whether you are going to live your life honourably or not."

G. BERNARD SHAW, on Vivisection.

Lectures and Debates on Vivisection can be arranged with Mr. SIDNEY TRIST, the Editor of the Animals' Guardian, and Secretary of the London and Provincial Anti-Vivisection Society. The Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL (City Temple), presiding over a meeting addressed by Mr. Trist at Brighton, said that Mr. Trist's speech "was the most illuminating speech on vivisection he had ever heard." No fees, but bare railway expenses. All applications to be made to Sidney Trist, Animals' Guardian, 22A, Regent-street, London, S.W. reports that in some places he met with a good deal of criticism and opposition, while in most places there was a ready welcome for the literature which he distributed.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE PROBLEM OF THE BLIND.

An important statement was made recently by Sir Francis Campbell, Principal of the Royal Normal College for the Blind, to a representative of the Daily News. He maintained that a blind man or woman from the college did his work better than a person who had proper sight, and that the greatest hindrance to the advancement of the interests of blind people was the fact that the whole world was more or less unconsciously against them. While everyone sympathises with the blind, there are few who are willing to help in the best possible way by giving them employment. A great effort has been made at the college to meet that prejudice by training the blind man so that he is better at his particular craft than people who can see, and the results have been excellent. When the public know of an opening which a blind man could easily fill, they should write to the college, and give some sightless, but industrious and skilful person a chance in life.

THE EMPEROR OF JAPAN'S POEM COMPETITION.

The Lady Sono, in attendance on the Empress of Japan, is doubtless a proud and happy woman, for she has won the first prize in the Mikado's New Year's Poem Competition for which no less than 29,353 poems were sent in. It is a relief to hear that out of fifty-eight which were commended only twenty-one were read aloud at the party arranged for the purpose by the Imperial Family, although it may be conjectured that the patience of the State officials was sorely tried when a poem by the Empress was read three times, and one by the Emperor five times. The Assembly standing respectfully, meanwhile with bowed heads. The subject chosen for the competition was "A Crane on a Pine Tree."

A CORNER OF THE COTSWOLDS.

No one who has ever crossed the breezy stretches of Minchinhampton Common, one of the most beautiful spots in England, well known at least by name to all ardent golfers, will hesitate to agree with the secretary of the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty that it should become national property. A committee has recently been formed for the purpose of taking steps to acquire the manorial rights of the Common, Major Ricardo, the lord of the manor, having expressed his willingness to give the Trust an option of purchase till May 1, for the sum of £1,250. This will enable the Trust if they can secure the money, to acquire the manorial rights for something like £2 an acre. We join very cordially in the hope that this sum will be raised before the date given for withdrawing the option. Contributions may be sent to Mr. E. W. Fyffe, Box, Minchinhampton, or to Mr. S. H. Hamer, secretary of the National Trust, 25, Victoria-street, S.W.

THE NONCONFORMIST PAGEANT.

The Free Churches broke new ground in organising the Pageant at the Horticultural Hall arranged by the Women's League of the London Congregational Union. The Rev. Hugh Parry, who wrote the book of the words, is a convinced believer in the teaching of history by means of episodes presented on the stage, and great credit is due to all who worked so hard to produce a performance which was said to compare favourably with the Church Pageant at Fulham Palace. The work was undertaken entirely by amateurs, and the episodes included the defence of Luther at the Diet of Worms, the singing of a song of thanksgiving by the Pilgrim Fathers on their arrival in the land of freedom, the rebuking of Beau Nash by Wesley at "a public place in Bath," and a dialogue between Mary Queen of Scots and John Knox.

THE RHODES SCHOLARS AT OXFORD.

The following analysis of the occupations taken up by the Rhodes scholars on leaving Oxford, which appears in the annual statement of the Rhodes Trustees, is of interest as showing the various spheres in which the influence of the founder of the scholarships will be felt in days to come. Out of about 250 men who had left Oxford up to 1910, 84 have given themselves to educational work and 66 to law. Doubtless many of these may enter public life, which Rhodes perhaps anticipated as a probable aim of his scholars. Our own Indian, Consular, and Colonial Services have secured four, the American Diplomatic and Consular Service two. Nineteen have undertaken religious work, eleven medicine, nine scientific work, eight business, five journalism, five mining and engineering, three agriculture, two forestry. Of the German students, thirteen have entered the Civil and three the Diplomatic Service in Germany.

THE CAPTURE OF THE STREET ARAB.

The street Arab of New York is not easily caught, and special devices have to be resorted to in order to save him from aimless pastimes or the habit of loafing. Accordingly, we learn from Progress, a Guild of Play has been started to organise games in the poorer streets and backyards of the city for those children who can not, or will not, go to the parks for recreation. The children are formed into older and younger groups of from 25 to 50 in each, the older for those from ten to fourteen years, the younger from six to ten, boys and girls being separated. The Guild has two main objects in view—to teach suitable games and foster a spirit of fair play. The playground is usually their own street, but if it is one with much traffic they are moved to the next, though it often needs much tact and diplomacy to induce the "gang" that rules in the invaded street to make peace with the invaders. In addition to the games the activities of the Guild include story-telling (the children's chief delight), singing, folk-dancing, and even hand-work, such as wood-carving and the making of toys.

EDUCATIONAL COLONIES FOR BOYS.

Captain Petavel, a member of the committee of the Educational Colonies and Self-supporting Schools Association, has written a pamphlet on "The Imperialism of the Future," in which he points out the importance of following up the school period for boys by a period of employment under the best possible conditions for moral and physical development. He gives an interesting account of the Witzwil Colony, in Switzerland, which owes its origin to the action of Herr Otto Kellerhalls, who has applied himself to the study of unemployables and the best methods of making them self-supporting. The story of Witzwil makes cheerful reading, and the writer of this pamphlet sees no reason why the scheme which has worked so well in Switzerland should not be seriously taken into consideration by social reformers in our own country, who realise the futility of talking about national efficiency while we are allowing so many lads in their teens to develop into loafers and criminals.

SUSTENTATION FUND.

At the Annual General Meeting of Contributors, held in Dr. Williams's Library, London, at 12.30 p.m., on Wednesday, February 14, 1912, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick in the chair.

The Annual Report and Balance Sheet were presented, and the following resolutions adopted, viz. :—

That the Report and Accounts, as now presented, be adopted, and printed for circulation among the Contributors and Friends of the Fund.

That the retiring Managers, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and Messrs. E. J. Blake, W. B. Kenrick, W. Long, F. Preston, and J. C. Warren, whose term of office has expired, having been nominated, and the requisite number of voting papers having been produced, be and are hereby re-elected as Managers of the Fund.

That the appointment by the Board of Mr. B. P. Burroughs as a Manager of the Fund in the place of Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, resigned, be confirmed.

That the Contributors approve of the action of the Managers in endeavouring, in co-operation with the National Conference, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Stipend Augmentation Fund, to formulate an Appeal for a Fund to provide more adequate Stipends for the Ministers of our Churches throughout the country.

That the sincere thanks of the Contributors be tendered to Mr. W. Byng Kenrick for his services as President during the past year, and that he be re-elected President for the year 1912.

That the Contributors have heard with much regret that Mr. Edgar Chatfield Clarke has felt obliged to ask to be relieved of the duties of Honorary Treasurer, and accord to him their cordial thanks for his services during the past seventeen years, and request him to continue to act until a suitable successor is appointed.

That the thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Frank Preston for his services during the past year, and that he be appointed Honorary Secretary for the year 1912.

That the services of Mr Edwin W. Marshall, as Honorary Auditor, be gratefully acknowledged, and that he be requested to accept the office for the year 1912.

That the Contributors heartily thank the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, who have generously granted the use of rooms for the Meetings of the Fund during the past year.

That the thanks of the Meeting be given to the Chairman for his services in the Chair.

LONGSIGHT FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, MANCHESTER.

Appeal and Bazaar Fund, 1911-12.
Special Effort to Raise £1,250

*The Bazaar to be held
November 6, 7, 8 and 9.*

IN submitting our appeal we have the following objects in view:—

(1) LIQUIDATION OF DEBT.—On certain property belonging to the Church there is a mortgage of £550, the balance of an original mortgage of £850.

(2) A NEW ORGAN.—We have hitherto struggled to maintain a good musical standard in our services. To this end we have been generously and effectively helped by an unpaid choir and organist. For the continuance of a reasonable efficiency we now require a new organ. The old organ has done splendid service; but it was not new when bought by us, and it has served us 28 years.

(3) RENOVATION AND REPAIRS.—The Church and Schools stand in real need of renovation. They are a splendid and substantial block of buildings, and attention paid to them now will be a genuine economy, likely to be felt for many years to come. Since the appeal was drafted the Sanitary Committee of the Corporation have given notice that the drainage requires certain alterations which will involve considerable outlay.

FOR THESE PURPOSES WE DESIRE TO RAISE £1,250.

The Congregation and Elder Scholars of the Sunday School have already promised donations amounting to the sum of £275.

For those in a position to consider our claims in another aspect, a word or two further may not be unwelcome.

The property already referred to represents the first effort of our Church to secure premises suitable to its growing needs, and to the dignity of its aim. The site on which it stands was bought with the intention of building a Church upon it. However, the site on which the Church now stands was thought a better one and the earlier site was turned to what would by now have been an excellent investment, had not the financial needs of the Church postponed the full liquidation of the mortgage. That the scheme was a sound one from the beginning is testified by the fact that the late Mr. R. D. Darbishire supported it heartily, and advanced the first mortgage upon it. The foresight which determined the change has been almost strangely justified. Town developments have made our present situation an ideal one. On the other hand, the old site would by now have been almost entirely unsuitable for Church purposes.

Another feature of our past we may venture to name as bearing upon the spirit of our appeal:—The Church has struggled hard to avoid becoming a burden to denominational funds. Official records dealing with its beginnings show this in words other than our own. Begun in 1866 on the initiative of a few earnest souls, without wealth or social influence, it has all along striven to be self-supporting, and has been for more than 20 years entirely independent of outside aid. This condition of things we aspire to maintain. We believe our aspiration will command your active sympathy.

At the present moment we stand at what we believe is a fruitful crisis in our Church life. The labours and sacrifices of the past have earned for us a great opportunity. This opportunity may either be frittered away or utilised decisively. We have fine Church and School premises worth about £7,000. We have a growing congregation, consisting to a remarkable extent of men and women not hitherto connected with liberal Christianity. We have, too, an able and willing staff of workers. In short, we can pledge ourselves to an effort worthy of your generous support.

Our future is a promising one. Unlike many city Churches, our position will assure rather than threaten our prosperity for many years to come. The neighbourhood is a residential one, offering a fine field for enlightened progressive religious work. So far as can be seen, adequate assistance at this crisis of our Church life would set us free for purely spiritual work for another generation.

In conclusion, we humbly pledge ourselves to do all that earnest and prayerful effort and sacrifice can do to justify any consideration and practical aid you may extend to our undertaking.

The appeal has received the endorsement and commendation of the following:—The British and Foreign Unitarian Association and a donation of £50 conditional upon £1,200 being raised; The Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches and donation of £30; and the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., President of the National Conference.

We are, yours faithfully,

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ALL interests have been overshadowed this week by the progress of the negotiations carried on by the Government in order to avert the threatened coal strike. At the time of going to press the news is very grave, and a disaster to the industrial life of the country is imminent. An official paper has been issued, which contains the following deeply significant statements :—

(1) His Majesty's Government are satisfied, after careful consideration, that there are cases in which underground employees cannot earn a reasonable minimum wage from causes over which they have no control.

(2) They are further satisfied that the power to earn such a wage should be secured by arrangements suitable to the special circumstances of each district, adequate safeguards to be provided to protect employers against abuse.

THE principle of the minimum wage has thus been conceded in the highest quarters, and in the past few days it has been winning converts rapidly. Even The Times has expressed itself in the following terms: "There is no doubt whatever that the solution of the problem lies in conceding the minimum wage with due safeguards. It is universally felt that men who do the work of the coal miner ought not to be liable, through no fault of their own, to the deprivation of a fair wage which they are willing to earn and would earn if they had the opportunity. That is common justice. But it is no less justice that the employer should be safeguarded from the abuse of the privilege." In face of this conversion of public opinion further resistance on the part of a section of the coal-owners seems to be quite useless.

We cannot see what they hope to gain by prolonging the controversy until a minimum wage is imposed upon them by Government action.

THE coming week is likely to be one of much strain and considerable provocation. If there are inconvenience and suffering, they will not be cured by wild and whirling words. Nor should it be forgotten, even by those who are most stern in their denunciations of the men, that there is a fine element of chivalry in their action. The movement is not in the interests of well-paid labour in order that it may secure a larger share in the profits of industry. It is a plea for the rights of the bottom dog. Whenever the strong come to the help of the weak, we need not necessarily admire the prudence of the methods adopted; but we cannot and we ought not to withhold our tribute to the spirit of brotherhood, which is ready to suffer for another's good.

MR. L. T. HOBHOUSE gave an important address last Saturday at the Manchester Reform Club on "Democracy and Diplomacy." He contended that the policy of secrecy in foreign policy was a failure and led to backward and reactionary movements which were out of harmony with the democratic spirit. Why, he asked, should it be supposed that if a democracy was capable of governing the conduct of its social and domestic affairs, it was incapable of governing itself aright in its relation to foreign nations? He attributed the prospect of better relations with Germany almost entirely to the pressure of public opinion. But if public opinion was to be effective it must be kept well-informed.

REFERRING to the causes of the failure of a secret foreign policy, Mr. Hobhouse pointed out that in cases where there was "a continuity of policy," and no effective public opinion, the control of policy was apt to fall into the hands of Government offices. Government offices generally were bland and impassive. They went on their own way and stuck in their own rut. All this was even more so in the Foreign Office, because it was not open to competition—and did not get the pick of the brains of the country as, for instance, the Treasury Office—and was staffed by nomination. Offices meant office traditions; and when the office had got it into its head that "Germany is the enemy," nothing would get it out of the office head.

THE Professors of Divinity in the University of Cambridge have taken a significant step in recommending that the condition whereby Divinity degrees appear to be restricted to clerks in Holy Orders in the Church of England should be removed, and a declaration of assent to the formularies of the Church of England before admission to these degrees should be no longer required. They base their recommendation firstly on the fact that while originally the degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred authority to teach, it is valued now chiefly as affording evidence of proficiency in theological studies, and secondly on the distinction in these studies gained by members of the University who do not belong to the Church of England. These men, they point out, are at present debarred from obtaining from their University the appropriate recognition of the work they have done.

PROFESSOR BENNETT, the Secretary of the Board of Theology of London University, has expressed his cordial approval of the proposal. He regards it as a step towards complete freedom for Nonconformists, and one calculated to raise the value of the Divinity degrees at the older universities. He maintains that the London system has proved the working of undenominational degrees in Divinity to be quite practicable. The questions were not set so as to disclose the student's own opinions, but his knowledge. He would not be asked to prove the doctrine of the Trinity, for instance, but to say what other people had taught about it.

CANON HENSLEY HENSON has done a courageous and independent thing in asking the Rev. J. M. Thompson to give a course of lectures on "Miracles and the Christian Faith" in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. In his first lecture Mr. Thompson pointed out that it was an enormous relief to many minds to be allowed to dissociate their faith in Christ from the materialistic ideas with which it had so long been entangled. It would soon be regarded as a truism that the alleged miracles either admitted of natural explanation or did not happen as they were described. The idea that the ordinary historical methods were inapplicable to the miracles attributed to Christ was a monstrous fallacy, and would deprive Christianity of all claim upon the human reason. It was, he thought, likely and there was evidence, that Christ had the healing power in an uncommon degree; but that was no excuse for neglecting to demand specially strong evidence for acts apparently beyond common experience.

In his second lecture, delivered last Wednesday, Mr. Thompson began by repudiating the idea that an attack on miracles was an attack on God. The religious sense, he held, was free to hold that God acted directly in and through our lives, but not to say that any event happened other than as science and history determined. The word "providence" might well take the place of "miracle"; it suggested regularity and permanence in God's work, together with a sense of love. He pleaded further that to give an historical account of the religious sense was not to detract from its value. Ultimately, God was spirit, so we might expect more providential activities in mind than in matter, and should scrutinize most carefully what seemed material providences. We could not find God in anything that reason said was untrue. The evidence for His providential working was to be looked for rather in the psychical than the physical sphere.

SIR JOHN MACDONELL, the Quain Professor of Comparative Law, delivered a lecture at University College, London, last week, on the "Trial of Servetus." The jurist was much more severe than some recent historians in his condemnation of the part played by Calvin in the affair:—"To the lawyer the trial from first to last seems an amazing medley; there are confusion and vacillation, denoting determination to obtain a conviction without clear perception of how this was to be done; first one prosecutor, then another, then a third, and in the end Calvin, without any official position, dominating the proceedings. First one set of charges, including a count for slander of Calvin; these withdrawn or dropped without, as might be expected, a verdict or judgment of acquittal being pronounced in favour of the prisoner; then a new set of charges substituted; the arguments in Court not closely confined to the issues thus raised, but allowed to wander into all sorts of theological discussions and to degenerate into rude personalities; the Court partly abdicating its functions and taking the opinions of various cities and individual pastors; the real prosecutor, Calvin, in the course of the trial and at a critical point therein haranguing the people and denouncing the accused, and by letters and otherwise seeking to influence the referees or assessors. The sentence, too, not strictly founded on the charges, but vague and declamatory, and in it no clear finding as to any offences committed within the territory of Geneva. Grotius, a severe critic of the trial, points out that Servetus had excited no disturbance or engaged in any propaganda within that territory. It is hard to believe that a trained jurist, such as Calvin was, did not see that he had gained his end and killed his man by irregular means."

* * *

THE lecture concluded with a brilliant plea for justice as the measure of civilization:—"A comparison between the trial of Socrates for asebeia before the Heliastic tribunal at Athens and that of Servetus before the Geneva Court is all to the honour of the former. The sentences of both Courts were errors; but in the trial before the Athenian tribunal were none of the elements of brutality, savagery, and personal spite conspicuous in the other. In the theocratic democracy there may have been a higher standard, but the trial speaks of a lower life. It has been said in palliation that Calvin was only of his time; the blank pardon served out for every deed of violence; an admission that he, a great moral teacher, was not in advance of his time. . . . There is no accepted test of civilization. It is not wealth or degree of comfort, or average duration of life, or increase of knowledge. All such tests would be disputed. In default of any other measure, may it not be suggested that the degree to which justice is carried out is as good a measure as any—the degree to which men are sensitive as to wrongdoing and desirous to right it? If that be the test, a trial such as that of Servetus is a trial of the people among whom it takes place; and his condemnation is theirs also."

SOME THOUGHTS ON COMPREHENSION.

WE publish a letter to-day by the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, which raises once again the question of the meaning and limits of comprehension in a religious society. He is able to use to advantage the vague emotional appeal to the idea of Liberty, and to suggest, almost as a matter that requires no proof, that a form of religion which is marked more by diffusive sentiment than personal loyalties has escaped from bondage into the freedom of the truth. With Mr. ROBERTS' desire to be as broad as possible there will be general agreement, but it is possible to doubt whether we can discuss this question to much profit in such a rarified atmosphere of logic, apart from the needs and experiences of life and the verdicts of history, which is only life writ large.

It must be remembered that the prophets and martyrs of comprehension in a former age were far more deeply concerned with providing the best possible conditions for the growth and expansion of a common Christianity than with the promotion of an abstract doctrine of freedom. Their philosophy of liberty was only incidental to the preaching of the Gospel. When BAXTER proclaimed his unwillingness to impose limits upon the Church which would rob CHRIST of any of his flock, his resistance to unnecessary doctrines sprang out of his burning desire to draw men to a common centre. It was the very richness of the contents of his own religious experience which enabled him to contend so mightily against the imposition of definitions which limited the power of the Gospel. This attitude of mind is very different from that of the French illuminati of the eighteenth century, with their scorn of superstition, their intellectual curiosity, and their overweening confidence in the power of the human mind to create its own religion, if indeed it happened to be so weak as to need one. We fear that the intrusion of this spirit into English religious thought has led to some fatal confusion between the liberty of the Christian man, which only exists in relation to a common centre and is in itself a form of passionate loyalty, and the freedom which is always pleading for detachment and values the tolerant curiosity of the intellect more highly than the soul's experience of reconciliation and peace.

In the movement towards wider fellowship, which is so characteristic of religion at the present day, with its fine impatience of artificial barriers and its deep humanitarian feeling, there is, we believe, a pressing need that the confusion of thought to which we have just alluded should be recognised and avoided. On the intellectual plane, as students of history and critics of ancient records, men may live in friendly isolation from one another and recognise their differences as the piquant condition of progress. But when we come to the life of the affections, and to religion, which is the life of the affections at its highest and best, discord ceases to be a blessing in disguise. Fellowship becomes a paramount necessity. The hard nodules of individuality, which provoke to controversy or dissension, must yield to a gradual process of fusion in a common life and worship. And this means that men must confess in their hearts their loyalty to a communal affection, that their lives must move round a common centre, that there must be a constant surrender of the smaller preferences of liberty in order to secure the larger freedom of the whole. Without this there may be paper schemes of union, which will exhaust themselves in the sterile discussion of nicely balanced compromise, but there can be no union as a fact of life.

The simple inevitableness of this truth is often obscured by the ease with which many religious arguments evaporate into vague abstractions or fancy schemes of our own choice. We forget that in religion above everything else the stern logic of experience is expressed in the words, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." When, however, we turn to questions of morality and the daily conduct of life we are no longer self-deceived. Great as our zeal may be for the revision of our moral code, when it has become hard or pharisaic, we do not waste our time in discussing schemes of comprehension in order that we may make our peace with polygamy or treat Christian virtue as a matter of private opinion. NIETZSCHE had the courage to fling himself in stormy wilfulness against it, but with most of our theorists, who want to create some better religion than Christianity, there is a tacit assumption that the Christian character will survive as a central and dominating fact. Our correspondent himself betrays no desire to get rid of it, or even to treat it as indifferent in any scheme of religious fusion. We give him credit for too much reverence for the noblest spiritual acquisition of the race, and too clear a perception that in the end he will still need to find the Christian character, its justice and pitifulness and sacrificial love, reflected in the very heart of God, to believe that he would even dream of making the attempt. It remains as one of the limiting conditions, imposed by life itself; and it is only as we accept it and honour it that we begin to understand the high privileges of spiritual freedom.

Religious freedom, then, like every other kind of freedom, is limited and relative. It may be limited by artificial conditions which narrow human intercourse and obscure the vision of the Highest. Then we rise up in rebellion, and the battle is joined for liberty. But it is also limited by all the vital facts which constitute our spiritual experience. When we try to ignore these facts, or to rebel against them, we are only preparing disaster for ourselves. It may be that for our correspondent Christianity is not one of these vital facts. If so, we are in strong disagreement with him. The men who regard Christianity as a more or less accidental illustration of a spiritual principle, or as a code of religious teaching, or as a finished chapter of ancient history of which the dim and receding memory alone survives to our own day, are not to be regarded as religious liberals to the exclusion of those who, with sympathies probably as broad and knowledge at least as unprejudiced, read the facts in a very different light. What if Christianity, and all that it claims of men in personal loyalty and love, be a reflection of the Divine mind under the conditions of time, and its life which enfolds us with its redemptive energies be as real a fact of present experience as the food we eat or the air we breathe? What if it be true that we cannot think a thought about God without the pressure of its influence, or ever demean ourselves so low as to escape from the exaltation of its presence in our hearts in pleading and rebuke? Why, then it becomes at once one of the vital facts, and the men who accept it in this way and see how it conditions all the possibilities of freedom for them, are doing exactly what every scientific man does in his laboratory. They are accepting the verdict of experience and the manifest teaching of things as they are.

No scheme of comprehension is likely to be worth the paper on which it is written, no invitation to enter into fellowship will stir even a languid interest in the hearts of men, unless it comes from a Church of ardent faith and clear convictions. And the last thing such a Church will ever think of doing will be to try to live on a common minimum of faith, or to enter into any compact of silence on many of the things which are nearest to its heart. That is the danger which underlies Mr. ROBERTS' position. Simply as a general plea for intellectual breadth and charity, it has our hearty sympathy. But in so far as it is founded on the belief that abstract principles are more consonant with the inclusiveness of the kingdom of God than personal loyalties, or is prompted by an effort to escape from the steadying and centralising influence of history in the chaotic warfare of personal preferences and desires, we believe that it is deeply and lamentably mistaken. No religion has ever prospered by shedding its most distinctive features and becoming less articulate. On the spiritual side it can only lead to the sterility of a divided allegiance, and finally to the indifference of death.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

THE CITY OF A DREAM.

SHE has been called "The City of Churches"; I have rechristened her "The City of a Dream." If anything can compensate one for the unpleasant necessity of rising early it is the fact that the sun rises also. If there is any pleasure in starting for business at an hour when one would much rather be in bed, it is the fact that the Lord of the Day is commencing his business too. These winter mornings I watch his performance from my seat on the tram car, and rejoice accordingly.

I do not know whether there is any relation, save an imagined one, between music and colour, between the harmony that pleases the ear, and the harmony that delights the eye. Certainly the sun should rise to an accompaniment of music; when the first silver and grey streaks the heavens, when the soft clouds are violet and rose, harps and flutes and violins should greet the dawn with a soft low prelude. When, leaving the mists behind him, as a god uprising from his slumber, the glorious sun bursts in splendour over the city towers, his coming should be heralded with a fanfare of exulting trumpets.

But to return to my city. In the clear light of uncompromising day she is very far from being a dream city, this stony-hearted stepmother of mine whom I have learned to tolerate because I needs must. Her walls and towers are only stones, her roofs cold slates and tiles, her factories huge boxes built of bricks pierced with a hundred oblong pitiless eyes called windows. Many of her streets are grey, monotonous, unlovely, and terribly real, and her step-children who walk these streets are not fairies, or dream people, nor are they ghosts; they are men and women with sorrows and joys, easily cast down, lightly lifted up; in short, flesh and blood, heart and soul, "even as you and I"—real people in a real city who have to face facts, and so go about their work, or neglect their work, but have little time or inclination to dream.

Yet from my seat on the car the city that lies before me, overarched with a Turner sky, is the city of a dream. Ethereal spires and towers rise from the golden mists of a frosty morning, like the masts of sunken vessels rising from the sea. The haze, coloured by the sun, transforms the factory chimneys till they show like fairy palace towers. Afar, St. Mary's stately spire is silhouetted against the rosy east, and St. Stephen's, whose pinnacles have not yet caught the light, rises a ghostly grey. Alighting from the car, and descending the hill, I leave the clearer air and enter a spectre world of gloom. The streets of the city wrapped in the fog are inhabited by ghosts. I hear the crescendo of approaching footsteps, nod "good morning" to a familiar face, the footsteps die away, and the man I knew becomes a ghost again. Huge Juggernaut cars with glaring devil eyes slide out of the darkness to the reiterated clanging of gongs. Cabs without horses, impelled by a spirit hidden in their vitals, breathing forth ambrosia, grunt and fume as they slither round street corners to a noise of exploding pistols, and the tooting of toy trumpets. The sun shows for a moment, like a blood orange invisibly suspended, then the fog-wreaths blur him from my sight.

Seen from the hills the city was a dream city, walking its narrow walled-in streets it is the city of a nightmare. I do not know what fearful thing may snatch at me from the darkness, and with long octopus-like tentacles drag my shrieking self beneath the wheels of one of those Juggernaut cars. It is, indeed, with a grateful heart that I arrive at the office and light the gas.

My city is not always wrapped in fog, for like the sea or a woman she has many moods; or rather, the sky above her and the atmosphere are ever changing, and her aspects change accordingly. There are mornings when beneath a flaring sky the North wind covers the heavens with flaky clouds that are lit with vermilion against a background of duck egg-green; when the blue smoke from a thousand chimneys is blown to and fro by the gusts; when the long shadows lie across the streets, and the sunshine, filtered through the atmosphere, lights the houses and the towers, the passing cars and the faces of men and women with a luminous glow. They seem happy then, the children of the city, going to their labour beneath the morning sun. There are mornings, too, when all is grey, the rain falls from a grey sky on grey roofs and pavements, grey towers and buildings; there is no colour, no spot of scarlet or blue, not even a soldier's red coat, to relieve the monotony of grey. With heads bowed beneath their umbrellas, clad in sombre brown or black, the sad citizens pass to and fro; the motors splash mud, and the electric cars utter shrill sounds, like the noise made by a wet finger rubbed round the rim of, a thick glass, as they slide over the rails.

It is the atmosphere that colours everything. Poets have written of the beauty of the cities of Italy, of Florence, Geneva, Rome. We want a great artist to paint for us the changing aspects of our English cities, for it is the very fickleness of our climate that lends them a beauty different from, but scarcely inferior to, those Continental cities where the sky and the sunlight are brighter, and everything is harder and more clearly defined. Even iron girders, plate glass windows, and unlovely slate roofs can be transformed by the atmosphere until they become almost beautiful. Instead of emphasising the ugliness of our modern cities, would it not be well to seek for and emphasise their beauty and romance? It should be the duty of the artist and the poet to find and express that, if it can be found.

Perhaps modern things because of their newness must always seem ugly to the contemporary mind. Yet there is a great deal even in our cities of to-day that is beautiful. It is the lack of appreciation that is to be deplored even more than the lack of things worth appreciating. When men begin to look for the beautiful they will desire an increase of it. Slowly but surely they will take a growing interest in the improvement of their cities, not for purely material or practical purposes, but because they will desire that public buildings, streets, avenues and parks should redound to the credit of the inhabitants. It is strange if with all our resources and wealth we cannot accomplish this. I see in a dream my city of a dream, her stately towers resplendent against the morning sky. There are squares in my city made beautiful with statues and fountains; ample parks bright with flowers, and trees beneath whose friendly shade the aged rest and dream. There are lakes where men and maidens row in boats, and children play by the water, and scatter crumbs for the swans. The streets are broad so that there is room for the traffic to pass without danger and room for the winds of heaven to blow. The city belongs to the people, and the people love their city. They have built municipal museums, art galleries, libraries, and theatres. Long ago they became so ashamed of the slums that by degrees they abolished them. Although many still work in the factories, they do not work so long that they have no leisure to enjoy themselves in the parks, or view the pictures in their galleries. Moreover the factories, instead of being ugly buildings, are now beautiful buildings. The citizens have not returned to nature, but they have endeavoured to bring nature to their city.

Is this desire that my city, and that all our cities, should be more healthy and beautiful, altogether an idle dream?

THE EXTIRPATION OF THE FIT.

MR. and MRS. WHETHAM challenge nearly all those movements in English social life which claim to be called progressive. The test which they apply is this: Does social and legislative action change the composition of the race for better or for worse? The answers which they give to this question are extremely disconcerting.*

In the first place, the care which the State and voluntary action have directed towards the feeble-minded, instead of being remedial, has actually intensified the evil with which it is dealing. The fierce struggle for life which drives the weaker to the wall is more merciful in its ultimate result, we are told, than "that interference with natural selection which is the outcome of the unregulated humanitarianism of Western society." For inferior types multiply more freely than superior ones. The generations will see an ever increasing proportion of vicious individuals unless measures are taken to maintain the purity of the race. Environment "can alter in no way the racial qualities of more distant generations, except in so far as it encourages or obstructs the increase of one type of humanity rather than another." "This interference with the environment on behalf of the feeble-minded is, therefore, an attack delivered by the present generation upon the future wellbeing of the English people. The association of degeneracy with crime adds a moral danger to the physical one. Degenerate persons are a source of moral contagion. Hence a race which is physiologically degenerate will also exhibit moral decadence. Therefore moral decadence is no less a symptom than a cause. We are now beginning to reap in England the evil, as well as the good results of the philanthropy which succeeded the policy of laissez faire. The incapacity for sustained effort shows itself in many ways. For example, the books we read, the music we hear, must be flavoured and adjusted to minds which scarcely know what sustained mental effort means. Hence the cheap papers which circulate among the poorest classes demonstrate by their character the degeneracy which marks an increasing proportion of the population.

In the next place, education administered as it is for the most part without any regard to racial traditions, is probably more harmful to-day than at any previous period. For, owing to the extension of the kindergarten system, it is breaking down in the younger child those family traditions of good habits, good housewifery and religious practices which accompanied the life of the last generation but one. I am glad to find that Mr. and Mrs. Whetham lay great emphasis upon this fact. I should like to quote in full the whole of their chapter upon "The Problem of Education." The reader who is unacquainted with the methods of sociology will learn with surprise that the old dame of the village school had many noteworthy advantages over her successor. Why? Because she handed down the traditions which were appropriate to the local type of child.

According to Mr. and Mrs. Whetham, the present position of woman in England is both a symptom and a cause of social disorder. The opening of the professions to women has lessened the amount of employment which is open to men. The consequence is that fewer men are in a position to make a home; fewer women are married. The competition for employment is thus again intensified, consequently the home upon which all social order rests is increasingly jeopardised. The improvement of higher education for women is not an unmixed good, we are told; for education is largely directed to making women efficient for various employments. The ablest women are thus drawn off from family life into business life. And here I must quote a remark or two which the authors are bold enough to make, and which I have just the courage to quote. "It is impossible not to see, at any rate in the upper classes of English society, that there is at present a real connection between the decline in the birth-rate and the movement to equalise the political and industrial status of women. It is a noteworthy fact that in some of the Australasian colonies where women enjoy the suffrage, and in France where women are actively engaged in business and in commerce, the birth-rate is almost the lowest in the civilised world." Mr. and Mrs. Whetham suggest a new kind of referendum: "It would be extremely interesting if the secretaries of the respective Women's Suffrage and Anti-Suffrage Societies would furnish us with authentic figures as to the average number of children born per member of each society." This suggestion is deserving of grave consideration for reasons upon which the authors lay all possible emphasis.

We have thus briefly considered three of the destructive factors of social life, destructive, that is, considered from this particular standpoint. If you resent such criticism of unreflecting philanthropy, of education, of the enfranchisement of women, you may be reconciled by a principle which Harnack laid down some years back for the study of history. "Nearly all forces which are active in history, taken by themselves, are without character, and are to be regarded as positive or negative, according to the historical conditions of the moment." He went on to say that "socialism and individualism, internationalism and nationalism, free trade and protection, increase of population or its decline, are in themselves neither helpful nor the opposite until we bring them into relation to the whole state of society."

There is one motive which alone seems to possess a character always positive, always helpful, namely, the search for human perfection. We have learnt from the books under review that the mere calculation of happiness for any given generation, may be a guide to the most deplorable mistakes. The happiness of a single age may be enjoyed at the cost of national existence. On the other hand, the search for human perfection is, so far as we can see, inevitably accompanied by conflict and suffering. Sorrow is a minster of God. "If each one of us were asked whether, on behalf of ourselves; we wished all power of feeling pain, physical or moral, to cease, there is little doubt that a universal negative would greet the proposal." Mr. and Mrs. Whetham assume rather too easily in this sentence that utilitarianism is dead. Certainly the social numbers which they quote in their useful little "Introduction to Eugenics" remove some of the grounds upon which the utilitarian interpretations of politics are based.

But it would be unfair to represent the authors as prophets of unrelieved misfortune. Let us take from them one example of a hopeful character. They find in the remarkable survival of the Jewish people a clue to some of the conditions upon which racial survival is grounded. The Jewish religion is intimately connected with the survival of the Jewish race for reasons which the authors set before us in detail; and the education of the Jews was persistently united with their religion. "No system less organically sound from the biological point of view could have made it possible for a nation insignificant in numbers, bereft of a fixed habitation, to survive so many of its oppressors. Truly there is always a future for a nation that can adjust itself to the eternal purpose which governs the universe."

The authors infer from this that the separation of training from religious education is a biological mistake. "It is only a supernatural sanction for unselfish conduct such as will not be obtained in any technical institute, that has been found strong enough to influence the mass of mankind against the pursuit of mere temporal advantage." The opinions which we have been considering are supported by the statistics which are increasingly at the disposal of the sociologist. And those who dislike the conclusions of the sociologist can only vent their dislike by calling his facts in question. Such books as "Hereditity and Society" and "An Introduction to Eugenics" make for soberness and confidence in dealing with the religious and social questions of the day.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

STRIKES.

I.

PERMIT me to express my sense of gratitude to Mr. Schroeder for his thoughtful article on this subject. His anxiety seems to be to avoid anything of the nature of bias or emotionalism. After a careful reading, two questions occur to me, viz. :—

- (1) What is the writer's standpoint?
- (2) What impression will be left in the minds of his readers?

The standpoint appears to be that of organised society with its "harmonic working together." The impression left, I fear, will be that Labour is the discordant element in society.

May I express the hope that the discussion will not be side-tracked? If the main issues can be kept before your readers, it will be better than discursive treatment of such topics as the employment of the military in trades disputes and the fulfilment of contracts. These are germane to the subject of strikes, but undue attention to them would defeat Mr. Schroeder's object—an "honest attempt to understand the whole situation." I beg to submit the following propositions :—

- (1) Strikes are educative.
- (2) Steps towards "readjustments of industries" should be taken by the comfortable, educated classes.
- (3) A new economic temper is needed.

(1) That strikes are educative was demonstrated last year when labourers struck for a pound a week. I believe it came as a positive shock to the general community to find that large numbers of men were in receipt of less than that sum. The facts had been disclosed in workmen's meetings and in their journals, but it required the evil of a strike to bring the facts home to the comfortable classes. Mr. H. Stanley Jevons illustrates this educational factor in a letter to the Daily

News for February 23. Apropos of the coal crisis, he writes: "After a week, mills and works may begin to close; after a fortnight we shall be nearing a national disaster, and the public will seriously ask who is responsible for the strike. This is precisely what the miners want unless they get the minimum." Alas! the public does not "ask" until its conveniences and comforts are interrupted.

(2) Believing with Mr. Schroeder that strikes, like war, are evil, and that "the right settlement of disputes lies in the cultivation of practical religion," I suggest that steps towards the rapprochement of capital and labour must be taken by capital. The strike is a two-edged sword, and often wounds the hand that wields it. Considering his economic dependence, the man who strikes engages in warfare that may prove deadly. Much more advantageous is the position of capital. Its eggs are not all in one basket. As a rule, it has comfort, imagination, culture. Labour is on the plane of feeling; capital on the higher plane of thought. From labour there may be no language but a cry, but from capital reasoned speech and patient consideration are due. That this is being widely felt, growing appeals to the gentlemen of England are sufficient demonstration.

(3) Last summer my interest was keenly aroused by a report of the proceedings of the half-yearly meeting of the shareholders of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway. The staff at their Horwich loco. works was on strike, and the directors were declining to meet the men's union officials. A Mr. Taylor, of Bolton, appealed to the Board to address itself to the men's case, as he felt that real grievances existed. He was treated, however, in the same way as those well-meaning people who ask at railway meetings for a curtailment of Sunday trains. Mr. Schroeder rightly says: "There is only one civilised, effective way of settling disputes, and that is by arbitration or by conference." Unfortunately the temper of the time is not in accord with this.

Ministers find themselves in a very delicate position. Only this week Dean Welldon has been told by a Labour leader to "stick to his own work of saving souls in his own sphere, and to leave them (Union leaders) to attend to the social salvation of the workers." How "saving souls" can be distinct and separate from "social salvation" might be intellectually shown, but in practice the two things go hand in hand. Prof. Jacks, by his luminous interpretation of the "parable of surprise" (vide Hibbert article, "A Psychologist among the Saints"), has drawn vivid attention to the social element in Christianity. It may not be good for apostles "to serve tables," but they cannot escape the economic side of life. I do not know a better way of correcting indifference and merely academic views than by the sympathetic projection of one's self into the circumstances of others. Your readers are acquainted with the anxieties connected with the supervision of industry and commerce. Will you allow me to bring before them three cases taken from the other side?

(a) A textile engineer, thirty years of age, with a splendid record of work undertaken for his employers, both at home and abroad. Now in fifth week of unemployment owing to shortage of orders. Meanwhile must support his wife and two children out of small savings and A.S.E. unemployment allowance of 10s. per week.

(b) An ironworks labourer. Wages, £1 per week. Two children. Wife recently confined and new suffering from hernia.

(c) A broker's odd man. Work intermittent. Wife unable to leave her bed since confinement seven years ago. The child a God-send, but must be supported.

These are specimen cases. I could produce others. Drink and laziness are not factors.

The late Viscount Goschen, in an address on "Economics and Ethics," once said: "Mark that the attitude of the economist is no less ethical than that of the emotionalist—it is more far seeing, more social. It looks to the good of the community. It is called hard, but it is wise, and it serves the general interest" ("Essays and Addresses on Economic Questions"). If economists claim to be ethical and social, there is hope that ministers, while avoiding the excesses of emotionalism, will insist upon the claim being substantiated.

WALTER SHORT.

Stalybridge.

II.

I AM reluctantly forced to the conclusion that your correspondent, W. Lawrence Schroeder, has neither fathomed the full meaning of the labour unrest so much in evidence, nor yet made himself impartially acquainted with its method of expression. Whether it may be held to add weight to my statements or to detract therefrom, I frankly admit that I have but recently relinquished the secretaryship of a trade union conciliation board after a service of sixteen years. At the same time I have throughout that period consistently advocated the claims of arbitration.

Speaking of strikes, Mr. Schroeder says: "They are frankly and professedly selfish in their operations; no society strikes save in the hope of individual gain." Mr. Schroeder ought to know that it is no uncommon thing for strikers to refuse a settlement owing to the offer failing to carry its benefits to its worst paid and most needy section, whether in a single or a combination of trades. But even taking the strike at the estimate of Mr. Schroeder, is he not somewhat precipitate in raising the cry of "selfish" before recognising the possibility of the existence of such a motive as that of perfectly legitimate and righteous self-interest through which the Almighty is calling his human family to a fuller life?

As to the strike being anti-social, well a knock at your door may for a moment arrest the progress of the game you are playing within, but since it is the only method by which your friend can gain admission and the interruption but momentary, you do not upbraid him for his anti-social interruption. So with strikes; assuming that all other avenues are closed, they become the only method by which labour can gain admission to the shelter and habitation to which it rightfully aspires. As to their being a "disruptive force," "provocative of enmities," savouring of "physical and material war," involving "appeals to passion," and generating a temper "that is subversive to social order," precisely the same objections might be lodged against the action of the householder persisting in entering his home when he knows that burglars have already done so.

It is, of course, true that any act of combination must depend for its ultimate moral sanction upon its object and its method of attainment, and it is equally true that strikers are not always necessarily in the right. If Mr. Schroeder could but realise that the failure to recognise the obligation of individual moral responsibility when in combination, the failure to honourably observe agreements, the failure to adhere to legitimate notice, the disregard of social ethics, and the willingness to take a mean advantage, are weaknesses in human nature quite as much in evidence in the ranks of employers—and I unhesitatingly assert a great deal more so—he would perhaps have had the fairness to extend his criticism to the lock-out together with the strike. Then as to the charge of intimidation and tyranny. Does Mr. Schroeder think that labour organisations are more conspicuous sinners than those of employers in this respect? If so, he has much to learn before he is fully acquainted with the whole question. But in any case, what would Mr. Schroeder say to the Puritan who objected to pay his rates owing to the engagement of a Sunday band in the municipal park?

But the worst feature in his paper is the insidious leaning towards the idea of suppressing the aspirations of labour by means of the soldiery. We are not far removed from that state of affairs when force would beget force with terrible results, except for one consideration, and it is this. So soon as you attempt to set the soldiery of this country to use their arms to any considerable degree against their fellow countrymen and fellow aspirants for a fuller life, other complications will arise which no Government will be so foolish as to completely ignore. It appeals to one's sense of humour to see Mr. Schroeder deprecating the idea of being able to establish righteousness by "brutal revolution" such as strikes, after imploring the gentle aid of military operations in defence of food supplies and travelling facilities.

There are those whose travelling facilities and food supplies have long been suffering from chronic disorder, and will so remain until they are induced to arise to a conception of their rightful and dignified self-interest, and to enforce the same upon a lethargical community by means of a lawful organisation by the best method available. By this means alone they will ultimately be found within the range of the voice of those who would call them in the name of the Prophet of Galilee to a higher social, moral, physical, intellectual and spiritual life.

A FREE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

SIR,—On the Sunday after the meetings of the Eighth National Triennial Conference of (as Mr. Armstrong put it) "Unitarian and other Churches," in Liverpool, April 21-24, 1903, the minister of Hope-street Church preached a sermon which he published under the title of "Some Conference Notes." The concluding words were these:—

We are in spirit and in fact, if not in outward organisation, one Free Catholic Church—the name which best of any ever suggested describes the true ideal of our Churchmanship—Free, each preacher and each worshipper before God and man to think his thought and speak his word and do his stroke as the divinely given essence of his inmost personality shall constrain him; Catholic, all-embracing in sympathy, by a sentiment going down deeper than all creeds, opinions, and intellectual divergencies; a Free Catholic Church with a great and divine mission in these times of compromise and paltering with truth, a great mission entrusted to us by God to strike for sincerity and truthfulness in religion above all else, sincerity and truth brought to bear on the world's sorrows and sins, weaknesses and blind perversities, that so we too may do our part towards bringing the blessed Kingdom of Heaven and God to earth and man.

In the spirit of this noble passage I trust that the Committee of the National Conference will approve of a resolution to be submitted to the forthcoming Conference at the business meeting. The exact terms of appeal and welcome to all and sundry—"whosoever will"—may well be the outcome of a friendly discussion in your columns. The times, indeed, call for action. The fact of a "Free Catholic Church" in essence, if not in name, is evident from the existence of a "National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations." Whether its constituents are aware of its present-day obligations I cannot say, and whether they will be willing to extend its scope I am very desirous to know. Are we, on the one hand, to restrict our allies to non-subscribing congregations, and thereby exclude from a Church of the Free those who are making for freedom in "the open way" of religious thought and aspiration, in spite of old and stiffer trust-deeds; or are we to make overtures to them for inclusion in a "Free Catholic Church"? And, on the other side, are we to be ready to offer fellowship with any congregations and societies of more extreme views, who nevertheless may be willing to embrace religious communion on an open "Free Catholic Church" basis?

Recent events in Yorkshire, the necessary changing of the name of the Yorkshire Union, and the inclusive formation of a Sheffield and District Union, indicate the desirability of a larger and more comprehensive "Church" than ours actually is. The proper persons in my judgment to extend a public and official invitation to all congregations that "will," are the President of the Conference himself (to whom it would be as the fitting crown of an arduous and "Catholic" career in the extended spirit of his "Presbyterian ancestors") and a representative from Yorkshire. But, in any case, as the matter will undoubtedly be brought forward, if the Committee accord permission, it is very advisable that so important and vital a subject should previously be turned over in our minds.

And now, before entering upon the historical aspect, may I be allowed to soliloquise? I am a little alarmed at certain tendencies of the "Liberal Christian" school, for this may be rendered more "narrowing" than any view held under the term "Unitarian." The official change from the "Progressive League" to the "Liberal Christian" League has been marked by, rather has been the mark of, a backward step. Mr. Campbell, as I read, has complained that arrangements for him to preach in a "Unitarian Church"—I quote from The Christian Register—"have greatly misrepresented him before the public." From our own group of Churches a friend writes:—

I began the work of a Christian minister in a group of Christian Churches, Christian by long habit and tradition, as in their religious practice and tone. I have always tried to be loyal to that fine Christian heritage, and my experience of life has only made my grasp stronger upon the central Christian loyalties. They are the centre from which charity and tolerance, and understanding of the beliefs of other men radiate.

Here is displayed the sense of a fine rich devotional spirit which no Church can afford to ignore. But would this "Christian" plead for the welcome of a "Brahmo Somaj" congregation into our "Free Catholic Church"? I fear greatly the untoward practical effect upon comprehension of any view of the Christian religion as "final." Father Tyrrell, a Free Catholic "Christian," speaks of the Church "as a teaching Church," just because "she is a learning Church," and declared "Modernism makes no pretence of being either a complete or a final synthesis." This seems the truer view.

Again, another letter, from which I he more gladly quote as it implies a judgment upon myself:—

The people will have a religion. . . . And once this regular devotional life becomes an actuality among our people, our perennial discussions as to what exactly we mean by the Mastership of Jesus would settle themselves, and cease, dissolved in an atmosphere of devotion; whereas now they are hardened by the astringency of an atmosphere of dialectics.

Here I ask, if this friend will accept as the basis of a "Free Catholic Church" just that which is signified by the words "Religion and Devotion"? That is all my present concern, and it is sufficient answer to the remarks of a very learned reviewer in a contemporary, who has said, "Our own experience of the people of 'the open way' is that they very often urge you to come off on to their own side track." I personally am not aware of any such urging.

Much has been said and written about "the Presbyterian ancestors." In their day they were as much "Catholic Christians" as their consciences permitted. Baxter's declaration of the necessities of public profession in a National Church had exactly 200 years' start of Dean Stanley's, who, in 1868, propounded his theory of the doctrinal basis of a National Church. He (Stanley) would make the Church as inclusive as the nation. He would abolish all subscription to creeds and formulas except, perhaps, the Apostles' Creed. And Baxter, as a Dissenter, was without this compulsion. The "Catholic Christian" sentiment became the very watchword of the congregations in whose line we should be proud to claim that we stand. The "Catholic Christian" of the Bible was, for his day, in an impregnable position. With the Bible as the "seat of authority," that was the most comprehensive position attainable. And not only was it demanded; it was granted.

"Go on, gentlemen," said John Seddon, of Warrington, in 1762, to the members of the Octagon Chapel, Liverpool, "with the same spirit and prudence in which you have begun to assert your just liberty of worshipping the Deity in the manner most agreeable to the judgment of your own minds; and doubt not but that the good Providence of God will give success to your worthy and upright intentions."

And, comments Thomas Bentley to Seddon:—

If Mr. Clayton comes here, he will doubtless come with a design to preach his own sentiments. He must also come with a disposition to excuse those amongst his hearers who may not think exactly as he does.

Sixty-four years later, in the neighbouring cathedral city (Chester), Joseph Swanwick, in the name of the congregation worshipping in Matthew Henry's Chapel, said to the incoming minister:—

We anticipate in you a diligent and cautious examination of the nature and bearing of Scripture evidence, a fearless following out of truth, an annunciation of your opinions characterised by a firmness which shall mark your feeling of their importance. . . . In us who stand upon individual judgment and conscience, rejecting all creeds and all human dictation, a lack of charity were an error indeed. . . . We ask you for no confession of faith. . . .

To-day, eighty-six years later, in the further and consistent evolution of the spirit of this pronouncement, we may call ours "The Church of the Free Spirit." Oursential principle as bearing on terms of admission, must be "No Tests: No Doctrinal Questions." The literal actuality of the individual worshippers in our congregations must be the unqualified privilege of all congregations banded together in any Church that aspires to the name "Free." Such a Church, and such a Church only, can claim to be the true modern representative of our older congregations. A "Liberal Religion" must include all religious men and all religious societies who will to enter; and there are many religious freemen and societies to-day who stand outside our own distinctive and honourable religious heritage. Let us offer welcome to them, and set up of ourselves no bar. The plea on the left wing in our time can be no statement of belief that Jesus and the spiritual experience which he created are the only fundamental facts in the spiritual universe as we know it. It cannot dogmatically declare that a Christian Church, with these central loyalties alone, has consistency and character, and possesses all the liberty of which human experience permits. Do men say "Your Church of the Spirit must have some definite character and content"? I answer that the question is not valid; for the problem is solved by the practice of our own congregations. That which is "Free," "Catholic," and a "Church" will ever become fuller in "the knowledge of the Lord," and ever more creative of faithful and fruitful citizens in His kingdom.—Yours, &c.,

THE SELBORNE SOCIETY.

SIR,—I have read the very appreciative notice which you were good enough to give of the Gilbert White Exhibition, and it has occurred to me that some of your readers might care to hear what the Selborne Society is, and does.

It was constituted in the year 1885. At first it occupied itself more especially with the amenities, and since that time several other societies, such, for instance, as the National Trust, have come into existence and undertaken certain of its objects. As is right, it perpetuates the memory of Gilbert White, and its first intention now is to encourage the study of Natural History. Through the Bird Sanctuary Committee of the Brent Valley branch, it interests itself in attracting and providing nesting sites for wild birds, while a very necessary Plant Protection Section has recently been brought into existence. There are at present three thousand members, and as the subscription (which includes the Selborne Magazine) is a small one, many more are required if the Society is to realise all its possibilities.

Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE SAINTS' APPEAL. By the Rev. S. A. Alexander, M.A. London: Edward Arnold. 2s. net.

THIS is a little volume of seven sermons preached by Canon Alexander in St.

Paul's Cathedral. The publisher announces that while suitable for devotional reading throughout the year, the book will be found specially helpful as a companion for quiet hours in Lent. We have found it too full of the vigorous and martial note of an aggressive Christianity to be suitable for the quiet hours of devotion. They deal with the meaning of All Saints' Day, and emphasise the militant challenging temper of the saint as well as his gentleness and meekness. It is his heroic strength and not only his sweetness that we find here. And if Lent be a season not of gloom and mortification and penitence only, but of the athletic renunciation and discipline whereby we equip ourselves for sterner warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil, as Jesus fought the temptations of the wilderness, then, indeed, this book is a suitable book for Lent. Canon Alexander has much vigour and directness of utterance as well as a broad and hopeful outlook on life. But he is a little less than just in saying that Non-conformists, "the body of Wesleyans in particular, parted from us through haste and misunderstanding. Looked at largely it was the separation of a mother and daughter who have quarrelled about something that is not really important." That is not the verdict of impartial history. They parted on matters fundamental to the sincerity and inwardness of religion after they had in vain "urged their reforms from within," and it may be seriously asked whether any reforms from within have ever been radically successful in ecclesiastical life. We prefer Canon Alexander when he says: "Do you suppose that the page of history would be so scarlet with the shame and black with the shadow of religious persecution; do you suppose that there would have been in the past, or that there would be to-day, so miserable a waste of energy and enthusiasm as we see in the controversies of the Church, if our first question about a man were not, 'What are his views? Does he belong to my own party? Does he hold this doctrine, or practise this or that ritual?'—but if our first question were, 'Is he a really good man? Is his religion a power in him and not a form? Is he true, earnest, self-devoted, sincere? Is his heart on the side of the saints? Do we see as he passes by the flash of those 'white robes' of the Apocalyptic vision, the vesture not of correct opinion, but of character, of Saintliness?'"

THE CARDINAL ELEMENTS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITH. By Prof. D. S. Adam, M.A., B.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

THE lectures of which this volume is composed were delivered to students at the University of Melbourne during the winter of 1910. In the first of them, Prof. Adam puts the argument for the theistic conception of the universe very clearly as against the materialism of Haeckel and the pantheism of Spinoza. Among the other topics of which he treats are man's sinfulness and Christ's atonement, and these are dealt with from the point of view of one for whom apparently the Westminster Shorter Catechism is still a fairly accurate summary of Christian doctrine. The positions stated in the lectures are further elaborated in an appendix consisting of copious notes.

STUDIES IN THE HIGHEST THOUGHT. By A. T. Schofield, M.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

THE Highest Thought, in Dr. Schofield's use of the term, deals with "the relation of the finite to the Infinite, of man to God." Moving upon somewhat orthodox and rigid lines, and based upon a theory that sees in the Bible the only source of all Christianity, there is yet much that is suggestive in these studies. Moreover, such intimate statements as this: "Personally, I may tell you—you may think it rather strange—my endeavour is to know as many Christian people as I possibly can during this present life, so that I may have more spiritual friends in the other world," make the book interesting, even when, as in its literal acceptance of the millennium, we cannot follow its teaching.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

JOAN OF ARC.
1411-1431.

I.

"It is God, that girdeth me with strength of war, and maketh my way perfect."—Ps. xviii.

IN thinking what great Englishman I should have to tell you about next, I found I should have to take a great jump right away from the reign of King Richard II. in England to the reign of Henry VIII.—just about 110 years. In all that time we don't read of any really great man in England—poet, or king, or preacher, or scholar. The reason may have been because the country was so unsettled by wars that the people grew too poor and miserable to think of anything but just how they were to get their bread from day to day, and there was not peace or quiet enough for poets or scholars to write books. Edward III. was always fighting with the Scotch, who would not acknowledge him as their king, and this led him into a war with France (because the French and Scotch were friends in those days). This war with France lasted rather more than a hundred years, and after it came the Wars of the Roses, lasting for twenty years, between the families of York and Lancaster, who each thought they had a right to the crown. You can imagine how much England was upset by all this fighting, for either people were called off to be soldiers, or those who were left at home were made to pay for the keep of the armies, and this caused a great deal of poverty in the country. So, after looking through all the history of this time, I have been obliged to go out of England to find any one worth telling you of, and that person is a girl, but she is by far the greatest person we read of in all those 110 years—indeed, she is one of the greatest people in history. She had a great deal to do with the English, and I am afraid the English must always feel sorry and ashamed of themselves when they remember how they treated her. But the French, her own country people, should be still sorrier.

Her name was Joan of Arc, or Jeanne Darc, as it is in French—Jeanne is the French for Joan, and Darc was the name of her father. She was born in a little village called Domremy in the East of France, near the great forests of the Vosges, in 1411, and was the child of poor people—her father was a labourer who worked in the fields. Joan was a little girl who ran about with bare feet, and believed in fairies as most of the children did who lived near the forest. She used to herd the sheep in the day-time; in the evening she would sit spinning and mending by her mother. We are told that she was very clever with her needle, and people who knew her before she became so famous describe her as "a good girl, simple and pleasant in her ways." She was particularly kind to the poor and sick people in her village, and was always fond of church and of listening to the church bell, which reminded her of heaven and of all the things she used to think about when she was alone for hours looking after her sheep. As she was a Roman Catholic (like nearly everyone in France at that time) she used to think a great deal of the Saints. We shall see presently how it was partly this which led her to do such wonderful things.

All through Joan's life that great war between England and France which lasted a hundred years was going on, and several times while she was a child she and all her family had been obliged to fly to the woods to hide from the English, and had found their home burnt when they returned. This terrible war was begun partly on account of land which the English held in France, and which the French wished to win back from them (they were encouraged, as I told you, by the Scotch, who hated us then because they wished to be a kingdom themselves, and Edward III. had conquered them in many battles)—partly because the wife of the King of France, who was dead, had declared that her own son was not the heir to the throne, but Henry V. of England, who had married her daughter. That is just as if Queen Victoria, when she was alive, had said that the Prince of Wales was not to reign after her, but the Emperor Frederick of Germany, who married her daughter. And the hard thing for France was that several of the great nobles sided with England, so that the Queen's son, the Dauphin, as he was called, had not enough of an army to drive out the English, and things were going worse and worse with him. He was, besides, such a lazy kind of man that he did not seem to care much about losing his kingdom, and was of no use at the head of an army. He would have lost it altogether if it had not been for Joan of Arc.

Nothing is more wonderful in the whole of history than that a poor girl out of a village, who could not even write her own name, should have kept France for the French, instead of letting the English conquer it as they would have done if it had depended on the Dauphin alone. For now we are coming to the strange part of Joan's life. When she was about eighteen, the war was worse than it ever had been; Paris was besieged by the English, and a hundred thousand people died there from starvation and illness. Orleans, another large town, was also besieged by an army of ten thousand men, and all the little villages in the north were being burnt and robbed by the soldiers. People who were driven from their homes and wounded soldiers often passed through Domremy, Joan's village, and she was so sorry for them that she gave them her bed and nursed them if they were ill. She kept saying that she "had pity on the fair realm of France," that is to say, she could not bear to think of her country being in such a miserable state, and she was always thinking, night and day, what she could do to help it. She knew that God would help it if He chose, and she was always praying to Him and to the Saints to tell her if she could be of use.

At last, when Orleans was besieged, it seemed to her that she heard voices clearly speaking to her, voices of the Saints, and that St. Michael appeared to her in the midst of a great light telling her that she was to go to the help of the King of France and give him back his kingdom. First she was to take Orleans and then to see the king crowned. (St. Michael is one of the four great Arch-angels we read about in the Bible; he carries a sword, and is the Saint who watches over battles.) When she heard this, Joan at first shed tears and said, "I am only a poor girl, I do not know how to ride to the wars or to lead soldiers." She was very unwilling to leave her home and to try to do what was so difficult. But St. Michael appeared to her again and told her to have courage, because in heaven, too, there was "pity for the fair realm of France," and God himself would help her. Then she made up her mind that she must do as the Saint told her, and in spite of all that her father and mother and the priest could do to keep her from it, she set out. "I had far rather rest and spin by my mother's side," she said to the Governor of Vaucouleurs, a small town near Domremy, whom she asked to help her, "for this is no work of my choosing, but I must go and do it, for my Lord wills it." "Who is your Lord?" asked the Governor. "He is God," said Joan. When the Governor saw that she was in earnest, he promised to help her. He gave her a horse and two knights to show her the way to Chinon, where the Dauphin held his Court; but I must leave the account of what happened there until next week.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. JAMES FARRAR.

THE Stand congregation has suffered a severe loss through the death of the late Mr. James Farrar. He came of an old Stand family, and was closely associated with the chapel and Sunday-school throughout his life. If he was but little known outside the district in which he lived and the congregations nearest to Stand, he won for himself in a remarkable degree the respect and affection of his Stand friends and neighbours. He was the senior trustee of the chapel and school; and that office, which he had held since 1868, came to be in his case not so much a legal designation as a title of honour; for he was trusted and looked up to as counsellor and adviser by everyone who knew him. There was something in his quiet friendliness and practical sagacity that both invited confidence and inspired it, and no one ever had reason to regret that confidence. One of the most modest and retiring of men, he had nevertheless great influence, both in the life of the congregation and in a wide circle of private friendships. He took no conspicuous part in public affairs, being a worker rather than a speaker; but, when he did speak, he had a remarkable gift of saying just the right thing. He held steadily to Liberal opinions in politics, and found in the Unitarian form of religion the inspiration of honourable life, and the strength of simple piety. Till he was prevented recently by ill-health, he never missed being in his place at chapel every Sunday; and no one knows better than the present writer how great a help he was to the minister of the chapel by his sympathy and friendship. He was left a widower more than two years ago, and since then bore a burden of loneliness and increasing infirmity with uncomplaining and unfailing cheerfulness. He died on February 17, aged 67, and was laid to rest in the graveyard of the chapel he had loved all his life. He was a good man, and has left many sad hearts behind him.

R. T. H.

THE REV. J. KERTAIN SMITH.

WE have to record with deep regret the death of the Rev. J. Kertain Smith, which took place at Belper on February 20 in his 77th year. Mr. Kertain Smith was trained for the ministry at Carmarthen College and Manchester New College, London, and after short ministries at Plymouth and Newchurch, settled at Flowery Field Church, Hyde, in 1869. In 1889 he removed to Belper, where he remained till his retirement from the active ministry in 1905. A man of quietness and modesty, he did a great deal of unassuming work, which earned its reward in the affection of those to whom he ministered. The funeral took place in the Belper Cemetery on Friday, February 23. The service was conducted by the Rev. A. Thornhill, of Gorton, and the Rev. A. Leslie Smith. An address was delivered by the Rev. A. Thornhill, in which he paid a tribute to Mr. Smith's twenty years' ministry at Flowery Field, which was very notable for the prosperity of the church and the institutions under his care. In him Belper had lost one of its best citizens, who brought a wholesome and elevating influence into public life which was none the less deep and penetrating because it was quiet and unobtrusive.

THE REV. JOHN H. BELCHER.

WE regret to announce the death of the Rev. John Belcher after a long period of distressing illness. Mr. Belcher's early life was associated with Reading and the Isle of Wight. In Reading he spent some time in business in the well-known firm of Huntley & Palmer, biscuit manufacturers. Leaving Reading, he went to Aberdeen University and then proceeded to New College, Hampstead, to complete his preparation for the Congregational ministry. On leaving College he settled at Erdington, near Birmingham, where he spent many happy years. He studied hard, and it was whilst he held this pastorate that he formed the idea of reading the four Gospels in the light of the Socialist conception of life. This proved to be the decisive and determining thing in his career. Down to his last days he remained a Socialist, with fervour all the time increasing and doubts as to its wisdom and practicality growing less and less.

After leaving Erdington he was invited to the pastorate of St. Thomas'-square Church, Hackney. He took up that position with the feeling that the condition of his work there was ideal so far as he was concerned. Whilst there he organised a Sunday evening public meeting in the church after the service, at which he always presided, and where speakers of every type of thought spoke on the questions in which they were specially interested, and discussion followed. There were crowded attendances at these meetings. He occupied several public positions in Hackney, and he was very closely associated with the I.L.P. and the Labour Church Union, being twice chosen its President. Whilst there he also formed a Ministers' Association for the study of Social Questions, of which Dr. John Clifford was the President, and some High Church clergymen, as well as advanced Nonconformists, were members. This afterwards changed its name—its membership no longer restricted to ministers—and became the Christian Socialist League.

In 1905 he settled at Treville-street Unitarian Church, Plymouth, staying there six years, till he was laid aside by illness. He was put forward as a candidate for the Board of Guardians on two occasions in Plymouth, but he was too advanced, not to say too revolutionary, a thinker for the majority of the burgesses to vote for him. Nevertheless, he was greatly respected by many who were not able to accept either his religious or his social views, and there are those now in association with the Treville-street Church who declare they owe everything to him in discovering their mission in life and the earnestness of mind required to take it up. A friend writes of him:—"This was a life lived for the commonwealth of life. I have known some noble fellows, but none nobler than he. There were those who took offence at his teaching, and were even hostile, but no rancour ever appeared in his nature; he would find a reason for the hostility and explain it. He was a man of beautiful disposition and of a deeply religious nature, though after no one's pattern but his own."

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE Missionary Agent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (the Rev. T. P. Spedding) has completed an interesting journey among the churches in the Western Union, and reports increased vigour and hopefulness since the occasion of his last visit. The arrangements for the tour were most carefully carried out by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, B.A., Missionary Minister of the Union. The opening service was at Mr. Davis's own church in Gloucester, where a useful work is carried on despite the disadvantages which characterise a cathedral city. In the evening Cheltenham was visited, and here were many evidences of the revival which has followed the settlement of the Rev. J. H. Smith. The congregation has not only survived its recent troubles, but seems likely to regain a fair measure of prosperity. Next morning Mr. Davis accompanied Mr. Spedding to Bristol, where the Rev. T. Graham spent some time explaining the admirable work of the Domestic Mission, of which he has had charge for the last few years. An interview with the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the venerable pastor of Lewins Mead, followed, and Mr. Spedding went on alone to Bridgwater. A visit to the chapel and a talk with the Rev. E. C. Pike, and the journey was resumed to Taunton. Here a special meeting of members of the congregation had been convened in the Memorial Schools, associated with the name of the Rev. J. Collins Odgers. The Rev. John Birks stated that a scheme is afoot for a new organ, and some minor alterations with a view to add to the comfort of the meeting house, which is justifiably regarded as one of the finest in the district. A couple of hours next morning, and Cullompton was reached. The veteran Rev. Jeffery Worthington was full of anxiety about the little chapel, which must have a new roof, and at once; and other repairs as well apparently, judging by the ugly cracks which have developed in the cob walls. Mr. Worthington and his own people have made sacrifices in order to keep the roof above their heads; but the £150 required is quite beyond their means, and in a case of this kind it ought hardly to be necessary to issue the usual printed appeal for help. Here is an instance in which the work might be helped unasked—a work that has to be done whether the means are forthcoming or not.

Under the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor the congregation at Exeter flourishes, having a minister after its own heart, and conscious that its own peculiar tradition is worthily supported. At Sidmouth the church is prospering under the Rev. W. Agar. A good many alterations have been carried out recently, with the result that the cosy chapel, in its commanding situation, has been wonderfully improved, and quite naturally appeals to visitors who spend holiday in this quiet and delightful neighbourhood. Colyton was reached the same evening, and in this tiny village nearly a hundred members and friends of the church and school had assembled for a social gathering. It was held in a spacious room attached to the house of the Rev. W. B. Matthews. At Newton Abbot new life is showing itself since the settlement of the Rev. Frederick Allen. Moreton Hampstead and Tavistock, which were also visited, are labouring under difficulties, and there is, unfortunately, no improvement to be recorded of them. Returning from the edge of Dartmoor, the next visit was to Torquay, where it is hoped that the stone laying of the new church will shortly take place. A good site has been obtained, and the Rev. A. E. O'Connor and Mr. Henry Lupton have toiled for the building fund, but their list is not by any means full, and further help is required if the future is to be assured. The new church is likely to be ready in the late autumn.

On Saturday there was a Welcome Service at Plymouth, where the Rev. W. H. Burgess has succeeded the late Rev. Henry Rawlings, whose ministry lasted only a few months. Saturday's papers told of the passing of the Rev. J. H. Belcher, who resigned the pulpit at Plymouth in 1910, in consequence of failing health. The proceedings at Mr. Burgess's Welcome began with a resolution of condolence. The charge to the new minister was delivered by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, of Exeter, and Mr. Spedding was invited to speak upon the duties and opportunities of the congregation. On the way down to the service a visit was paid to a building which was formerly the Unitarian chapel of Devonport, but is now a wine and spirit vault. It is still known and described as "The Chapel," and a post card is handed to the visitor on which the following paragraph is printed:—

"This quaint old building, situate at the corner of Duke and George streets, Devonport, was originally built for the Unitarians in the year A.D. 1791, and was opened as a place of worship in 1791. The congregation of the Chapel decayed in consequence of its being understood that Commissioner Fanshawe intimated that all Dockyardsmen who attended the New Chapel would be discharged as disloyal subjects; the French Revolution was then in full operation, and the Unitarians were the most ardent admirers of that movement in Great Britain. Three of that sect were executed as ringleaders (sic) in a most disgraceful riot in Birmingham on July 14, 1791. Ten years afterwards, in 1801, the Chapel was converted, the conversion being as wide apart from its original purpose as could be imagined.

The Chapel became a Temple of Bacchus, dedicated to the sale of wines and spirits, thus the change from the Spiritual to the Spirituous. The old building still retains remnants of its ecclesiastical character, and a Chaplain is still attached who performs," &c.

Mr. Spedding preached to a large congregation at Plymouth on Sunday morning, and went on to Crediton for the evening service and an after meeting, both of which were fully attended. On Monday Crewkerne, where the Rev. A. Sutcliffe has both his church and school full, and Bridport were visited. The last places on the list were Trowbridge and Bath. At the latter place the Rev. John McDowell has been minister for several years, and his work is highly appreciated. At Trowbridge, after an interregnum of about three years, a new minister is about to settle, and the congregation, which has maintained its numbers during the long interval, is looking forward to a renewal of the prosperity which one almost naturally associates with the name of Trowbridge.

During his journey Mr. Spedding was able to interview most of the ladies and gentlemen who in the Western District assist the work of the Association as its local treasurers. He succeeded also in securing the appointment of some additional treasurers. The Association is engaging in an appeal for new subscribers in order that its work may be continued unimpaired. The Missionary Agent received many assurances of support in his effort "to obtain a thousand new subscribers and to raise a thousand pounds during the current year."

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT IN GERMANY.

Trial of the Rev. G. Traub, of Dortmund.

DR. WENDTE, writing in the Christian Register, alludes to the trial of the Rev. G. Traub, of Dortmund, the friend and defender of Pastor Carl Jatho, of Cologne, who has now in his turn been summoned to answer for his heresies before a church tribunal.

An attempt to try his case before a prejudiced ecclesiastical court in the Rhine province was foiled. It is now pursuing its weary way before a tribunal in Breslau, Silesia. He is conducting his own case with great ability, assisted by eminent counsel. The demonstrations in his behalf all over Germany are formidable and increasing. Even if condemned, he has the right of appeal. Ultimately, the same court which tried Jatho may be called together to give its final decision. The immediate result of this persecution has been to draw more closely together his own large congregation in Dortmund, which loyally supports its pastor, to greatly increase the circulation of the theological journal, Christliche Freiheit, which he edits, and to unite the progressive elements in the German State churches (there are over thirty of them!) in a determination to preserve their spiritual and congregational freedom. Whatever may be the issue of this trial, it cannot fail to exercise an important influence on the religious and church life of Germany in coming days. Meanwhile, Pastor Jatho not only preaches to immense congregations at home, but his audiences at the lectures he gives in the principal German and Swiss towns are very great. Recently elected to the Presbytery of Cologne, the government has seen fit to cancel the election. His religious instruction classes for children are particularly well attended.

WINIFRED HOUSE CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL HOME.

Annual Meeting.

THE annual meeting was held at Winifred House on Wednesday, February 28. Mr. C. Fellows Pearson was in the chair, and there was a good attendance of friends and subscribers. The treasurer, Mr. W. M. Blyth, presented the financial statement, and Mr. Ion Pritchard read the Committee's Report. This stated that the total number of invalid children received during the year was 45; of these 27 were new cases, and the average number in the Home works out between 16 and 17. It will be seen that hip disease and spinal mischief account for the more serious cases—the lying-down ones—and debility and rickets for the greater number of the others. The tabular statement tells also of the length of stay, a very important consideration in respect to the home, seven children having been there more than two years. There has been almost always decided improvement in health on leaving, and the committee are sure that the improvement applies in very many instances also to the habits and manners acquired by the children during their stay. Surgical operations in five cases have been necessary during the year, and the committee very gratefully acknowledge the help afforded by the Great Northern Central Hospital, so near Winifred House, first for so promptly receiving the little patients, and more especially for the ready and valuable assistance of the surgeon, Mr. Mower Waite, there. The financial position of the Home is satisfactory in so far that the invested funds amounting to £398 17s. 11d. have not been drawn upon. The income, £957 17s. 10d., including £100 legacy from Mrs. Bayle Bernard, an old friend of the Home, has enabled the treasurer to meet the whole expenditure, including the heavy outlay for repairs and decoration amounting to £118 9s. 6d. The subscriptions and donations amount to £552 6s. 7d., a little more than last year, mainly due to a generous gift of £25 from the Holly Hill Guild, a gift that may be an annual one for a few years.

The three Hospital Funds have again awarded grants: the Sunday Hospital £58 4s. 5d., the Saturday Hospital £35, and the King Edward's Fund £30. The committee are glad to be able to acknowledge these awards as practical and very useful recognitions of the value of the work and good order in management and book-keeping.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

An Appeal.

Mr. R. Asquith Wooding writes as follows:—

"In response to urgent entreaties, the Society has taken a larger house, 80, Darnley-road, Southend, which will accommodate twelve visitors at a time, instead of seven, which was the limit at Bernard Cottage. The object will be, as hitherto, to provide a house where teachers and elder scholars can be received as paying guests at very reasonable charges, and thus be enabled to spend an inexpensive holiday at the seaside. The house is much more conveniently situated than the old one, and has the additional advantage of being next door to the chapel.

"During the summer months Bernard Cottage was always full to overflowing, and had we had the necessary accommodation we could easily have filled it twice over. We have, therefore, every reason to believe that our new venture will be a success, and that during the summer months our teachers and elder scholars will make full use of the increased accommodation which the larger house offers. The larger number of rooms at the new house and their greater size have necessitated our buying additional furniture, fittings and house linen, the cost of which will come to fully £50, and for this sum we now appeal to the generosity of your readers.

"The London schools are being asked to make their effort to help, and we have no doubt all will respond to the best of their ability; but £50 is more than they can be expected to raise, and a considerable part of that sum will have to be met from other sources. We therefore appeal with confidence to the Unitarian public for help.

"All donations should be sent to the Treasurer, Miss Amy Withall, 15, Highbury New Park, London, N., and will be acknowledged in due course in THE INQUIRER and Christian Life."

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

THE MINIMUM WAGE QUESTION.

MUCH of the discussion which has arisen amongst the general public with regard to the threatened coal strike appears to overlook the fact that the "minimum wage" is new neither in theory nor practice. Some years ago, when public opinion was aroused against sweating, many reformers advocated a minimum wage as the only effective remedy for sweating. Bishop Gore has long laid down what he considers to be the Christian principle on the subject, "that the first charge upon industry must be a living wage for those engaged in carrying on the industry," and last year the British Weekly, which at least on social questions does not belong to the left wing, advocated a minimum wage in a series of well informed articles which appeared after the great industrial upheaval of the summer.

The minimum wage, therefore, is not only not a fantastic creation emanating from the brain of some unprincipled and irresponsible "agitators"—in this connection the word "agitator," when analysed, merely means a person who is advocating something which is different from what the individual who uses this term of reproach desires—but it is actually at work in our Colonies, and even in the United Kingdom. Many well-intentioned people seem to have forgotten the Trades' Boards Act, and still more, do not seem to be aware that the miners in some districts already have a minimum wage actually in operation. In some departments of industry, then, the principle is already established.

In view of current discussion of a complicated question, the gist of an article by Professor H. Stanley Jevons in The Housing Reformer (a monthly published in the interests of better housing conditions in South Wales and Monmouthshire) may be quoted here. As Professor Jevons is neither a coal-owner nor a miner, but a disinterested economist familiar with the local conditions of the Welsh mining industry, his opinion is all the more worthy of remark. "Looking broadly at the problems of life and work," he says, "the Garden City movement may be said to represent a thoughtful and practical effort to reach a more rational method of living. By careful thought on the main problems . . . it has already been proved that a vast deal can be done to improve the health of the industrial population with little extra expense . . . I believe that such reforms will be gradually applied in every direction, with the most momentous results for the benefit of mankind. In an especial degree do these ideas apply to the conditions of employment of labour—a field in which there could be a rich harvest if the right spirit and method were adopted. The spirit wanted is that of care for human well-being and happiness."

* * *

"The great difficulty of the problem now confronting the coal trade," he continues, "arises from the variability of human nature on the one hand, and the variability of coal seams, and the floor, roof, and coal conditions on the other hand. . . We are all familiar with the fact that different kinds of land are more or less fertile under the hands of the farmer, and we know that is the chief cause of variation in the rent paid per acre . . . but no such principle enters into the payment of colliers' wages. Every man is paid by the piece for the quantity of coal he produces. When he produces it easily he may make 10s. and even 15s. per day; when he gets coal with difficulty the same skilled man may earn but 5s. or even 2s. a day."

Other causes which have tended to lower the miners' net earnings are the depression of trade since 1908, the Eight Hours Act, and the rise in the cost of living. "The prices of provisions and the rent of houses have risen in South Wales at least 15 per cent. during the last ten years; and, unfortunately, there is every prospect of this rise of prices continuing, for it is world-wide in character. Such upward movements of prices always lead to industrial unrest, because wages are not raised in proportion until many years afterwards. . . The policy of the minimum wage is unquestionably a step in the right direction from the men's point of view, for it would at least give them protection against the chances of working in abnormally unproductive places, and against the effects of favouritism and bribery. In the present situation it may probably be said to be a measure of absolute necessity and of mere justice so long as the minimum is not put too high."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

DR. JAMES HOPE MOULTON is delivering the second course of the new series of Hibbert Lectures at London University, South Kensington, on Tuesdays, March 5 and 12, April 30, and May 7 and 14, the subject being "Early Zoroastrianism." The first lecture was given on February 27. Admission free.

THE annual meeting of the London Sunday School Society will be held at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Saturday, March 9. The business meeting at 4.30 will be followed by a public meeting at 6 o'clock. A statement will be made by the secretary on "How the National Insurance Act affects Sunday School Provident or Friendly Societies," and a conference on "The need for further organisation in the Sunday School" will be opened by the Rev. C. Roper, of Kilburn.

The Rev. Mortimer Rowe writes to warn our readers against a German who is going about under the name of Dr. Herman, of Elbing, obtaining money by false pretences. He is conversant with the doings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and speaks with some knowledge of ministers and other persons associated with the Liberal Christian movement both here and in Germany. People whom he may happen to visit should be on their guard.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Boston.—The members of the Spain-lane Chapel have suffered a serious loss in the death of Mr. William Bedford, J.P., which took place early on the morning of Tuesday, February 20. Mr. Bedford, who was in his 80th year, was a fairly regular attendant at the services in the chapel until a few months ago. Descended from an old yeoman family in Huntingdonshire, he went to Boston early in life, and gradually built up a big milling business there. Mr. Bedford was widely respected for his great integrity in business matters, as well as for his successful opposition to corruption in the municipal life of Boston. He was an ardent Liberal, both in politics and religion. He was twice elected Mayor, and only retired from the aldermanic bench a few years ago. At that time all parties requisitioned him to remain, but he was firm in his refusal. Never, he declared, would he consent to retain a position a day longer than he could discharge its duties. The funeral was a public one, and very largely attended. The Rev. A. G. Peaston officiated. On the following Sunday morning a memorial service was held at Spain-lane Chapel, conducted by the minister.

British League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women.—We have received from Miss Grace Mitchell, hon. sec. of the Fellowship Section of the League, some details as to the work which is being undertaken by this new branch, and the possibility of extending its influence in the future. The Fellowship Section has been started for the purpose of keeping the elder Sunday-school girls, and women members and workers who have to leave home for business and other reasons, in touch with the central organisation, so that they may not feel isolated even when there is no Free Christian church in the neighbourhood to which they have removed. Where there is such a place of worship, introductions are given, and a request is made that the members shall welcome the new-comer; in cases where there is no church within reasonable distance, an effort is made to enrol her as a Fellowship member at a subscription of 1s. a year. A Fellowship worker then sends her each month the League letter, a religious paper, and a personal letter often with enclosures and news of interest concerning the Free Christian churches. Within the last few months an attempt has been made to establish a world-wide fellowship. The members of the Women's Alliance, with its branches throughout the United States and Canada, have warmly responded to a suggestion that they should co-operate, and have offered to welcome in the spirit of the Fellowship any members of the British League who may emigrate to these countries. A correspondence has also been opened up with the women of the colonial churches with the same object in view. The Committee of the League Fellowship Section desire to be informed of the whereabouts of any members of the Liberal Christian churches who are moving to other parts of the country, to America, to the Colonies, or elsewhere. Address, Hon. Secretary of the Fellowship Section of the British League, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C.

Buxton.—The annual gathering of the Hartington-road Unitarian Church took place on February 21 in the schoolroom. The Rev. Geo. Street, the minister, presided, supported by the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, representing the East Cheshire Christian Union, and other friends. The chairman, in submitting the report, said that so far as the morning and evening attendance was concerned, the average had been maintained. The attendance at the Sunday-school had considerably increased. Two years ago a committee of men had been formed, but this year women had been admitted, the committee now being composed of as many women as men, which he considered was a wise thing. They had four mission stations. At the village of Flagg twelve meetings had been held during the winter months. At the hamlet of Pomeroy, at an inn called the Duke of York, a class had been held for some years. The landlord found the room and heated it, and did not charge a penny rent. It was an uncommon thing for a publican to have such a class; however, it went on very comfortably indeed; a quarryman played the harmonium. A class was also held at Litton Mills, this being the fourth season, and during the latter part of last year a new class had been started at Great Hucklow. In addition to this, illustrated lectures had been given as well. In accomplishing this work, he had travelled 850 miles and walked 230.

Chatham.—At a special meeting of the congregation of the Chatham Unitarian Church, held on Sunday, February 25, after the evening service, a resolution was unanimously passed requesting the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman to withdraw his recently tendered resignation. Since Mr. Whiteman announced his intention to terminate his ministry, many of those in the habit of attending the church realised the necessity of taking a more than passive interest, with the result that a large number have become subscribing members of the congregation. In view of this and other indications of a determination to prevent the resignation taking effect, Mr. Whiteman felt justified in re-considering his decision, which he at once declared his readiness to do.

Doncaster.—The Rev. Percy Jones reports encouraging progress at Doncaster. At the annual meeting of the Free Christian Church it was shown that the membership of all the organisations connected with it was growing, and the financial position was sound. A tender for the erection of a school-church, to cost £2,700, has just been accepted, and the members of the congregation are most anxious to raise £1,000 of this amount in the next six months.

Gorton.—The annual meeting of the congregation of Brookfield Church was held on Tuesday evening last under the presidency of Mr. Geo. Cocks. The report for the year was of a highly satisfactory character. Since the settlement of the Rev. A. Thornhill as minister there has been a gratifying increase in membership and in the interest taken in every department of work. The executive officers were heartily thanked and re-elected. A resolution placing on record the warm appreciation of the congregation for the services rendered to church and school by Mr. Waite and his family was unanimously adopted on the motion of the Rev. A. Thornhill, seconded by Mr. Geo. Daniels. Fuller reference to the projected Bazaar will be seen in our advertising columns.

Leicester.—The annual meeting of the Great Meeting congregation was held in the schools on February 22, Mr. J. G. Chattaway presiding. The report of the vestry referred to the building of a kitchen and other offices in connection with the schools which had been carried out during the year at a cost of £165. Reference was also made to the settlement of the Rev. J. H. M. Nolan, who had been appointed to take charge, under the Rev. E. I. Fripp, of the Great Meeting, of the Loughborough and Coalville churches. Mr. Fripp, in replying to a vote of thanks, hinted that the time was near when, without neglecting the Great Meeting, they would have to consider whether they ought not to embark on extension work in the London-road district.

London: Newington Green.—Upwards of 320 parents, children, teachers, and friends were present at Stoke Newington Green Church at the annual Sunday-school party on Friday, February 23. An excellent report was given of the Sunday-school work. During the year the numbers have increased in each of the societies. In the Sunday-school the average morning attendance out of a roll commencing at 144, rising during the year to 172 scholars, was 105, and in the afternoon 135. The prizes were distributed by Miss Sharpe, who spoke of the time, about sixty years ago, when she taught at the school and of her great satisfaction in its progress.

Stalybridge: Hob-hill Schools.—The great effort to preserve Hob-hill schools will be brought to its termination by the holding of a grand bazaar (See advertisement columns.) Urged by the Board of Education to make structural alterations, the managers were able to evade the burden until the arrival of an ultimatum that the Board would withdraw its recognition after April 30, 1911. Energetic steps were then taken, and means found of averting the calamity. When local Unitarians saw that townspeople and a few other friends elsewhere were prepared to help them they addressed themselves to the task of meeting the Board's requirements. The members of the family of the late Mrs. John Leech (who founded the day schools) have given nobly, as have local philanthropists such as the Right Hon. J. F. Cheetham, and the Summers family. From all sources about £800 has been received. The scheme, however, called for a much larger sum. It was therefore decided to hold a bazaar, in order to raise £1,000 in addition. Meanwhile, under the supervision of Mr. Percy Worthington, F.R.I.B.A., the building has been adequately altered and enlarged, and since October last greater comfort has been experienced not only in the day schools, but in the Sunday school and associated institutions.

Taunton.—The annual meeting of the congregation of Mary-street Chapel was held at the Memorial Schools on February 22, Mr. Edward C. Goodland presiding. The report of the committee for 1911 stated that the accounts showed balances on the right side, and that so far the financial position was satisfactory. Thanks to gifts from numerous friends, including £140 from Mr. Andrew Carnegie, a new organ had been ordered at a cost of £315, which it was intended to open in September. Considerable repairs to the fabric of the chapel had become necessary, and it had been decided to provide a new roof, to improve the ventilation, to have the interior cleansed and decorated, and the electric light installed.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE PEASANT ARTS FELLOWSHIP.

The newly formed Peasant Arts Fellowship, which has just held its first public meeting, has been formed for the purpose of following Ruskin's ideal of reviving country handicrafts, especially those of spinning and weaving, and to co-ordinate the scattered schemes of arts and crafts revival now being undertaken in various parts of England. It also desires to do something towards the enlivening of the countryside and stimulating the love of ancient festivals, local dances, folk songs and ballads which once helped to make the life of the peasant more interesting and pleasurable than that of the agricultural labourer to-day. Spiritual influences are not forgotten; indeed, it is the aim of this society to make the village church again the centre of a new religious life, but the whole movement is in accordance with the democratic tendencies of the age, and inspired by a belief in the capacity of men to rise to higher ideals of human activity and fellowship.

THE ENGLISH AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.

The Rev. A. H. Baverstock, who is associated with this timely effort to bring about a revival of rural crafts, has written an admirable little book (A. C. Fifield, 6d.

net) on "The English Agricultural Labourer," to which Mr. G. K. Chesterton has supplied an introduction. He has made a careful study of the English peasant, who is very much in danger of being overlooked at a time when press and Parliament are dominated by the townsman; and he brings to his task the sympathetic insight of one who realises the dignity and worth of the labourer's calling, and is "willing to learn from his simplicity much that has been denied to those whose life has been necessarily more complex." The agricultural labourer has been reduced during the last two or three hundred years from a condition of comparative affluence to one of destitution, and in spite of the advantages which he is supposed to enjoy to-day he is not nearly as free, as well fed and clothed, or as prosperous and happy as he was in the Middle Ages. He has, in fact, been the victim from 1563 to 1824, to quote the words of Professor Thorold Rogers, of "a conspiracy concocted by the law and carried out by parties interested in its success" to cheat him of his wages, "to tie him to the soil, to deprive him of hope, and to degrade him into irremediable poverty."

Mr. Baverstock has no panacea to offer which, if applied, would immediately raise the status of the English peasant, and give him back the communal life he shared with his fellows before the suppression of the monasteries, and the debasing of the coinage in Henry VIII's reign. But it is, he says, obvious that the first task is to awaken the general public to the need of reforms which will lie in the direction of more adequate payment, better housing, education which shall not unfit the youth for work on the land, and recreation of a kind likely to "relieve his life from monotony, season it with gaiety, and even invest it with dignity." We gather that Mr. Baverstock is profoundly dissatisfied with the way in which the whole subject of social conditions in the country is being dealt with at present, and that he dreads too much State supervision and compulsion in all that relates to the life of the working man. Something more must be done to promote self-development and encourage individuality, and he points out many ways in which those who have the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the farm-labourer can help to foster the spirit of co-operation and diminish the hostility which everywhere divides class from class, holding before the workers a higher aim than the desire to get the better of others, which is one of the worst results of past oppression.

INDUSTRIAL POISONING AND ACCIDENTS.

From statistics recently published it appears that there has been an increase during the past year in the number of people who have been poisoned, or who have met with accidents, sometimes fatal, in factories and workshops. The cases of lead poisoning have risen from 505 in 1910 to 669, the greater part of the cases being amongst coach and car painters. The deaths due to poisoning generally numbered 49. Industrial fatal accidents numbered 1,182 in 1911, as against 1,080 in 1910, and the textile factories were responsible for 99 deaths, 47 occurring in the cotton and 29 in the woollen factories. In the shipbuilding industry there were 156 fatal accidents as compared with 111 in the previous year. Machinery was the cause of 379 deaths.

ANTI-SLAVERY AND ABORIGINES' PROTECTION SOCIETY.

The annual report of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines' Protection Society for 1911 gives an interesting record of the work which has been done, and the information gained, during the past year in various parts of the world where the labour system is still tainted with slavery. Among the subjects dealt with are Portuguese slave labour, rubber slavery in South America, Southern Nigeria (House Rule Ordinance), the Congo situation, abuses in the New Hebrides, the Egyptian Sudan, the slave trade in Tripoli, and the native races in Australia. The journey of investigation in West Africa undertaken by the organising secretaries, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Harris, has aroused a good deal of interest, and if their tour is to include a visit to the Angola mainland and a short stay on San Thomé, it is hoped that all who sympathise with the object of the Society will come to its help financially, and not allow this important work to be crippled for want of necessary funds.

THE LABOUR LEADERS AND TEMPERANCE.

One of the organs of the brewing trade has recently remarked on the decline in the consumption of drink, but declares that it is not pessimistic, and that "a continuance in the immediate future of the tendency towards increased consumption of alcoholic beverages" is to be anticipated. Happily for the workers, almost all their leaders have come to see that the interests of the liquor trade are diametrically opposed to the interests of the working-classes. "The Trade" cannot understand this. "Whatever be the explanation," says The Trade Paper, "and it is by no means easy to find one, the fact remains that 'the Trade' has no more vindictive or more unfair opponents than the Labour members." Surely the explanation of this hostility is not far to seek. The Labour members are men who have had unique opportunities of studying the social conditions under which the great majority of wage-earners are compelled to live.

TEMPERANCE IN THE ARMY.

The Rev. A. E. L. Gedge, Chaplain to the Forces, Fulwood Barracks, in the course of a brief speech at the Guildhall, Preston, the other night, made special allusion to his experience among the recruits, observing that out of 287 who recently went through his hands 260 described themselves as total abstainers. In spite of the country's enormous drink bill Mr. Gedge did not think we need despair, and certainly not so far as the Army was concerned, for it was now no longer the "fashion" to get drunk. The majority of the young men who entered joined the Army Temperance Association.

A WOMAN'S EXHIBITION IN BERLIN.

An interesting sign of the growing influence of the Woman's Movement in Germany is seen in the exhibition "Die Frau in Haus und Beruf," which was opened last week in Berlin. Frau Hedwig Heyl, who performed the opening ceremony, at which the Empress was present, said that it signified peace at last between the rival claims of women's two great spheres of work, the home and her profession, which had at first appeared antagonistic to one another, but were now seen to be mutually complimentary. The exhibition, which is on a large scale, is being held at the Zoological Gardens.

EVENING PLAY CENTRES.

As a result of her recent appeal in The Times Mrs. Humphry Ward is able to announce that £1,600 has been contributed to her fund, £750 of this by one subscriber for the special maintenance over three years of the new centre in the Isle of Dogs, for which she pleaded. Two more applications have reached Mrs. Ward, supported by a well-known stipendiary magistrate, for new centres in Woolwich and Kilburn. The letters containing the application speak of the "moral starvation" and "sore need" of the children to whom these centres would apply, mainly the children of labourers and of mothers industrially employed.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE week has been one of hope deferred. The deplorable industrial situation has been lightened by two features, the patience and restraint of the public and the orderliness of the miners. On Wednesday the men's representatives were less uncompromising in their refusal to discuss their schedule of rates for a minimum wage, and the situation became at once more hopeful. As Mr. Philip Snowden has pointed out, the miners have to convince the public that their schedule is moderate and reasonable, and their own firm conviction that it is so should encourage them to court the fullest investigation into its details.

A CORRESPONDENT calls in question what we said last week about the element of chivalry which enters into this demand for a minimum wage. It has been the striking feature in recent industrial disputes that the chief aim has been to secure better conditions for the lowest grades of labour, which have been for so long defective in organisation and inarticulate in their demands. Without the help of the better paid who were asking nothing for themselves, success would have been impossible. It is this growing solidarity of labour, and the consciousness that the whole body must rise or fall together, which are creating an entirely new situation. In spite of its enormous and untried difficulties, and the much graver risks which result from imprudent action, we believe that it has in it higher moral possibilities than the old state of things, when detached groups contended simply for their own monetary advantage. The fact that men who have little to complain of in their own lot will accept a common policy which involves them in personal loss, has received various explanations. Some of them may be the victims of coercion. Others may be caught in the currents of a movement which they are powerless to resist. But we are convinced that there is also a growing sense of chivalry to their order, which deserves grateful recognition at the hands of religious men. The man who gives his own privation and suffering to help a comrade is at least as generous as any subscriber to a relief fund, and illustrates the spirit of self-surrender to the common good, which is one of the deepest motives of Christianity.

It is a welcome fact that the "Kölnische Zeitung," which is generally considered to reflect Government opinion, has endorsed the cordial words of Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg on the subject of Lord Haldane's recent visit. Last Saturday it published an article containing the following significant words: "All classes of the nation that possess any sense of responsibility and knowledge of practical politics, will echo his words in a sense that can only help to make easier the progress of this hopeful task. No sensible man needs to be told that all the misunderstandings that have in the course of years grown up between the two countries cannot be got rid of in a day. . . . But we may rest assured that the negotiations are on the right road to success. The fact alone that both Powers, with honourable intentions and mutual trust, have undertaken afresh to prepare the way for friendlier relations, throws a necessary light on the international situation."

WE do not intend to open our columns to a discussion of the pros and cons of Women's Suffrage. It can receive much ampler and more effective treatment elsewhere. Nor do we desire in any way to impugn the motives of those who were responsible for the scenes of violence and destruction in London this week. We give them credit for perfect sincerity in their intention to obtain justice and a wider sphere for the noblest influence in this way. But it appears to us that there is a distinction, which goes down to the very roots of life, between the sufferings and martyrdoms, which are inflicted by others, and those which we incur as the price of our own violence. It is only when we suffer for acts which are in themselves beautiful and good, as when men calmly persist in some nobler form of worship than public opinion is prepared to tolerate, that our suffering is the price of freedom and peace. It was thus that men suffered for the name of Christ till they made the cross into life's divinest symbol. If we ask ourselves whether we can conceive the breaking of other people's windows being changed in a similar way from shame into glory, till it becomes for future ages a sacrament of love, we shall see how deep and essential the difference really is.

MRS. ORMISTON CHANT reminds women who are called to suffer for the women's cause of this truth in a powerful letter, which appeared in the Daily News on Thursday.

"Many of us still living," she says, "fought a strenuous fight under the heroic and saintly leadership of Mrs. Josephine Butler and Professor Stuart against the most inconceivably hateful wrong that has ever been inflicted on women by one-sided legislation. There was some violence during the struggle, it is true, but it was wholly on the part of the abettors of evil and injustice. On our side the only weapons used were reason, the logic of facts, and the appeal to conscience, pity, and religion. We won; and what gained the victory then will gain it over political and other injustice, if patience has her 'perfect work.' . . . Violence and persecution are not the way to teach anything, even the A B C of political justice, and it is a deplorable leadership that justifies these methods. The finest heroism can be 'built' up on loyal obedience to Right, and a sense of Right can only be kept from perversion by keeping it supplied from its Divine Source, and the one victory that is ever worth having is that of love, and faith, and hope holding on, and not growing weary of well-doing."

On Tuesday, the Archbishop of Canterbury received a deputation who presented to him a memorial in favour of a fresh revision of the New Testament. The plea was based upon the deep affection which is felt for the Authorized Version and the pedantic qualities of the Revised Version of the New Testament which disqualify it for general use in public worship. The memorialists, who were numerous and influential and more representative of the interests of English literature and the public schools than of theological scholarship, suggested that a small number of scholars, including some who have made a special study of the English language as a medium of expression, should be entrusted with the task of correction, with instructions to alter the Authorized Version of the New Testament in those places, and in those places only, where it is erroneous and misleading or obscure.

THE Archbishop in his reply was not very encouraging. He pointed out that half the objections to the Revised New Testament were based on textual questions, not on questions of translation at all, and that almost every criticism of the Revised Version, for spoiling rhythm, making unnecessary changes, and so forth, had been levelled against the Authorized Version when it also was new. He thought, moreover, that it was not an opportune moment to attempt to do the work of the revisers afresh, when new light was being constantly shed on the linguistic and textual questions involved, and the scholars engaged in these studies were far from the completion of their tasks. He concluded with the suggestion that some experimental work should be done by private enterprise on the lines proposed. Then it would be possible to judge whether an authoritative revision was desirable.

THE National Council of Evangelical Free Churches has been in session at Cheltenham this week, under the presidency of the Rev. Thos. Mitchell. There has been the usual crowded programme, divided into different sections, the familiar timidity in handling intellectual difficulties, and a good many brave words about working men and the labour unrest. Public discussion has come to occupy such an important place in the activities of all the Churches that we have nearly reached the point of saturation, and it is tending rapidly to lose whatever hold it once possessed upon the public mind. In the interests of religion we should like to see a good deal more teaching similar to the series of addresses on the Reconstruction of Belief recently given by the Bishop of Oxford, and a great deal less platform oratory.

A VISION OF THE LIFE ETERNAL.

BY THE REV. WILFRID HARRIS, M.A., OF ADELAIDE.

THERE is a life that never dies. There is the life eternal. The life of the earth lives within it, and is dependent upon it. Eternal laws and eternal principles govern the world we live in; the atmosphere of our life is the atmosphere of eternity; we breathe the same air that God Himself breathes; we breathe the air of eternal things. And the winds of God that blow across all the ages, blow even now across our own world also. And the stream of Time that carries all the waters of our rivers of earthly life—that ever-moving river of days and years flowing peacefully onward into the boundless ocean of the eternal ages—is a stream that belongs to eternal life. It is to be seen only in the landscape of eternity; there, and there alone, are the solid river-banks through which it flows, by which it is confined within its proper and narrow channel, and beyond which lie the springing harvest fields of eternal things. The fruits of righteousness are ripening in the broad plain well-doings that belong to the servants of God. All their allotments of joy and of sorrow are here watered by the river of Time; but their solid purpose and possession are the purpose of eternal good, and the possession of these broad acres in the peace of God.

Heaven is here; it comes right down to the river; the very grasses that grow in the meadows of eternal life dip their bending green leaves in the water of Time, and tenderly chisel with an ever fresh and ever yielding pointedness the heavenly touch that turns the smallest ripples, and suggests a pause for thought upon the flowing stream of earthly days and earthly nights as they move so gently and so beautifully by.

The stream of Time runs, as I have said, through the meadows and the cornfields and the orchards of the life eternal. Fruit from the trees of eternity falls oftentimes into the waters of Time, and the rich rosy-red ripe fruits of righteousness as they grow in the garden of God—peace, joy, love, purity of heart—tumble down with a gentle splash amid our flowing stream of days and hours and moments. Who is there that has not felt the familiar sudden sense of a little depression, a dimple as it were on the smooth surface of some passing hour, as into the flowing stream of moments dropped the ideal perfection, and disturbed the quietude of earthly judgments with the weighty conviction of God's higher judgment?

So the river of Time runs through the orchards, meadows and cornfields of heaven. There are, growing beside it, eternal trees—justice, mercy and truth; and their roots run down to drink in moisture and nourishment from the ever fresh stream of countless new lives flowing like drops of real vigour in the stream of things, so cool, so clear, so transparent in its search for the righteousness of life. For each life is a new effort to fill the stream with a new truth, an added beauty, and one more deed of loving kindliness. From such a stream of ceaseless endeavours after eternal things the trees of righteousness, beauty, love and truthfulness may well derive continual refreshment, and draw up into eternity the very essence of the soul's own consciousness from out this liquid stream of souls confounded and confused in the rush of the river of Time. It is not all the water in the river that flows down to the sea. Countless are the drops that pass meanwhile into the herbage and vegetation, and take their place in leaf and fruit and flower, becoming the very essence of the seeds of heaven they help to form and ripen; for the river flows up into the trees of the garden, as well as down into the depths of the sea. And shall not this be so with the river of life? It flows, as all must allow, through the midst of eternal things. And blessed are they who give their lives as they go along to the nurturing of eternal truths, the unfolding of eternal principles, the ripening into action of God's eternal prayers for justice, goodness, and mercy.

Blessed are they who lose their souls—who lose them to bless the small beginnings of some noble purpose; who find the roots of the trees of Heaven coming right down to the water's edge of the stream of Time; and who give up their whole souls to nurture day by day the mighty growths of righteousness, whose wondrous fruits ripen above and sometimes fall into the river of our passing days.

Blessed are they whose souls come not at all to that especial sea which is filled only with the waters of a wasted life; the ocean of those who have passed every day, like a river, through the midst of the meadows, the cornfields, and the orchards of the Most High God, and have daily refused to give of themselves, and to give gladly, and to give all that they had; for whatsoever remains ungiven must now flow on. They have passed every moment of their lives in the presence of eternal things, within reach of some thirsty root, some overhanging tree, some eternal effort in the cause of righteousness, justice, and goodness; and they have ever refused to give of themselves. These are they that of necessity go down to that sea: the great salt sea of wasted opportunities. For only those may enter Heaven that help, by their very entrance, to grow the heavenly fruits. And so, in the great stream of days and years and ages there are surely the waters that must go on and on, and wearily on, and carry the prayers of heaven which they refused to answer as refuse to the sea: the great and bitter sea of wasted opportunities. For none, I suppose, shall ever flow into the sea of wasted opportunities save those that by their own flowing into it are adding to its bitterness. They bring the refuse of their own refusals; and tears from their own eyes shall salt it with salt.

Do you know that passage in the prophets about the wicked being like the waves of the sea, casting up mire and dirt? I think it is well worth your remembering; and as the stream of time flows through the terra firma of eternal goodness, like a river between solid banks on either side—and not all rivers flow out into the open eternal ocean of the open and free love of God, but some are lost in desert sands, some in stagnant, inland lakes—so now there has come suddenly into sight the Dead Sea, as a place of grievous disappointments, as a sea of restlessness, of endless uncertainty, unstable as water, lifeless in its salt, without trees, or flowers, or fruits; just the restless heaving of the soul of despair and the sullen depth of passions that every wind blows and ruffles, yet no season brings to any fruits.

There are, doubtless, many seas in the life eternal; but this is the Dead Sea, far below the level of the Holy Land, below even the average level of the ordinary seas of life, surrounded by precipitous mountains, cut off as it were from all escape from its own dismal pit, save by the one great way, the direct upward call of God Himself; then, as mists that rise by evaporation from the sea, from depth of sins over which only the forgiveness of God still shining like the sun can throw the beams of mercy still unchanged, and cover with a cloud of loving-kindnesses, even the sinner may be lifted up into heaven again.

So in a stampede of such joy and gratitude as forgets even its own sins, all its own sorrows, and leaves behind it all the salt in the sea of this bitter repentance, so, ascending thousands, like a gathering mistiness before the eyes, arise above the sea, and condense into a great cloud of witness—witness to the love of God. And higher, and ever higher, they rise, into the blessed sunlight, into the clear truth, into the eternal love. Songs descend, as of angels singing above the earth, as of a lark lost in the infinite sky, lost in the love of God; so rises the cloud of witness to sins forgiven, and to souls redeemed, and ascended again into the pure atmosphere of eternal life: these, that have passed through an ocean of repentance. There is joy in heaven, says Jesus, over one sinner that repenteth. The repentance is so perfect; the joy of it is so full of enlightenment, of sunshine, and of clear explanation. And none can tell hereafter the cloud that rose from that sea to distinguish it, in its perfect purity now, from the pure in heart that arose into heaven any other way. It is the forgiveness of God. And it is perfect.

I have wished to present this picture of eternal redemption, the mighty uplifting power of the ever-shining of the love of God; and I have wished to present it before your own eyes in the clear atmosphere of eternity, in the full sunshine of the most high God—the infinite purity of the washing wherewith God in His own good and perfect way cleanses at last from all sin; and as you yourself look out into the sky, and far as the east is from the west, and not a cloud remains, even the witness to it, the mere suggestion of having once been redeemed and uplifted out of it—the very remembrance, and every trace is utterly gone. I have wished first of all to present that picture, the infinitely clear sky, the whole atmosphere of eternal life—the Love of God.

And then, once more to cast our eyes downward upon the despairs and the miseries of the earth beneath; to look into the pit, not of fire, or of brimstone, or of any exciting adventure, but the real pit and pitfall of unexciting, uninteresting, dull, weary, restless, lifeless monotony, the mere love of self, that dead sea, the sea of lost opportunities; that deadly dull place, where all and every kind of wickedness eventually pours forth its one and weary complaint, that life is dull; for the wages of sin is its dullness, and the rapid racing river of time, the dancing days and the rushing of the years will not let the wicked drop altogether out of the stream of things until they can be dropped with solemn security in the deadly dull sea—at the end.

Just where we stand, then, in the atmosphere of eternal life, yet looking down and back upon that pitiful sea of our full-deserved regrets and miseries—just here we meet the prophet Isaiah; he seems to have been standing just here when he spoke two thousand and odd years ago, and his words come to us in the fulness of their meaning. He tells us he has a message from the Lord his God—what God means, and what God says, if men will have ears to hear from a fellow-man so perfectly human an explanation of what God is ever and ever saying to them. Harken to this far-calling human voice—Isaiah speaking to us across the ages, across the valley where the river runs:—

Listen—

“‘Peace, peace—to him that is afar off, and to him that is near,’ saith the Lord, ‘and I will heal him.’”

But—the wicked are like the troubled sea; for it cannot rest; and its waters cast up mire and dirt.

“‘There is no peace,’ saith my God, ‘to the wicked.’”

So, through eternal laws, eternal truths, and the justice and mercy of the life that lives for ever (and the life of earth is a section of the map of it and is a part of it); through the solid groundwork of eternal things, through the rock of ages, amid scenes of absolute truthfulness, the very mountains in their everlastingness slope down from the infinite perfection and purity of God, like snow-capped Alps no human climber could hope to ascend—slope down in infinite gradations to the level plains of our simple human well-being and well-doing; and the heavenly fruits of beauty, love, and joy ripen in glad sunshine and peacefulness beside the river of our own living, loving and vital effort, the continual stream of our life, like a flowing river on and on through days and hours and years of the Kingdom of God. In this eternal world we live, and, living, move a whole streaming world of living souls, living waters, the moving waters of life, one of God's rivers in the life eternal.

Here, in the midst of eternal things, we live, and have our daily opportunities of usefulness to Heaven, to God, and the glory of His paradise, in giving of our own daily effort to nurture the roots of the trees of life, the golden-eared cornfields of the living and growing Word of God, and the fresh green grasses in the peaceful meadow of eternal meditation where God himself talks with man in the garden in the cool of the day.

Thus, to know Thee, the only true God, and, in the daily spirit of our trust in and devotion to Thee, to know Jesus Christ whom Thou didst send, is not this “eternal life”?

Every day, every year, is one more turn in the ever-winding stream of our own lives, in the great stream of the ever-running ages, in the river of God whose wonderful waters are the living waters; they are alive, alive with you, and alive with me, the liquid onward gently moving consciousness of ever fresh opportunities of serving God and His goodness every day; for the river of our own lives, the stream of our own years is in Heaven, and the high banks that confine and keep us where we are are solid, they are the fields of heavenly things beyond and above our present sight and comprehension, overshadowed by righteousness, mercy, goodness, truth and beauty, and the sunshine of absolute perfection, and the air of life is scented with the perfume as of sweetest memories and eternal joys in full bloom, and an ample provision is made for sustaining the interest, the gladness, and the excitement of life for ever and ever. There are secrets upon the bank, like violets, and in the very river itself forget-me-nots. Here, then, is our daily and hourly life, the river of time; and every soul and every secret thought in the heart of every man passes, day by day, beneath these eternal and everlasting things, beneath the trees, and the inter-spaces of eternal sky, so infinitely clear in shadow or in sunshine. In the depth of the soul the life of each is transparent, good or bad, or struggling along in the stream; and every living soul is a seeing eye, observant of all around, and gazing upward from the liquid depths at the fruits of its own loving-kindnesses also at the fruits, the meditations, the variegated reflections, messages, and golden words and many meanings of God. Our life in its depths is hidden in the river of Time, for the banks of heaven are high, and the kingdom of God is above, and we are in the Paradise of God, a stream of living waters.

The river of Time is in the life eternal.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

DAFFODILS.

"A THING of beauty is a joy for ever,"—so swells the opening chord of the symphony that tells the story of a youth loving and beloved by a denizen of the upper spheres. The singer is himself Endymion, and the goddess he adored, that Beauty which was unto him even Truth, the ultimate Desire, the Last Reality. Keats has catalogued those things of loveliness whose images can move away the pall of despondency, disappointment or distress from our dark spirits. Among these shapes of beauty are

"Daffodils

With the green world they live in."

Once in Devonshire, the writer saw them as he fancied the poet himself in the same county must have seen them, when they made the lasting impression recorded in his chief poem. It was the first day of spring. The long reign of wet and cold was over. A wind from the south drove the white flock of clouds before it, to pastures beyond the horizon. In recovered carols birds charmed away all winter cares. The earth seemed to palpitate with joy as one moved with quick footsteps over it. Then one came to a sudden stop—startled and held by a vision of beauty. At the end of a meadow, in great clusters, grew the daffodils, waving banners of gold over the serried array of blunt green spears. At the foot of each cluster the recent rains had left small pools of water which mirrored the flecked blue sky and the fluttering flowers. So they courted the caress of the breeze between two heavens, making of themselves a third. A hundred times before had he seen the yellow "lilies of Lent," but this was the first time they were perceived. Burne-Jones used to regard all work as poor unless he could "make his picture sing." Here was a picture that sang in a strong fine strain. The place rang with the jubilation of the dancing daffodils.

Then was he able to share the wise folly of Wordsworth when the host of tossing heads along the banks of Ullswater Lake danced away his heart in jocund gaiety:

"The waves beside them danced, but they

Outdid the sparkling waves in glee;
A poet could not but be gay
In such a jocund company."

Then was he enabled to understand Shakespeare's hurrah:

"When daffodils begin to peer

With heigh! the doxy (glory) o'er the dale;

Why, then comes in the sweet o'the year;
For the red blood reigns in the winter's pale," and his amazement at their precocious boldness and unexpected beauty:

"Daffodils

That come before the swallow dares, and take

The winds of March with beauty," allaying the roughness of the wind, alluring, captivating it, until its brusqueness becomes a breath of adoration, its cut a kiss.

Then saw he why Constable compared his Diaphenia and Herrick his Julia to the daffodowndilly. Then knew he why the Welsh people had adopted it as a flower sacred to their patron Saint, David; why Proserpine risked rape into Pluto's realm in going out to gather the lovely leek on the fated day.

Daffodils especially have affected our poets with a sense of a lilting motion, of dance, of glee. With that their shape, their colour, their early glory have much to do. Out of the centre of a six-rayed star issues a trumpet, suggesting their function as blaring heralds of spring. Hence the Italian name, Trombone giallo. The scientist further reminds us that the luminosity of the spectrum culminates in the yellow, and diminishes rapidly on each side of it. We are also told by the psychophysicists that whereas arterial stimulants are those in which red predominates, nervous and cerebral stimulants are those in which yellow predominates. Again among sensitive children of the present generation, sensibility has become so extended that the barriers between the senses has grown very thin; so that in them certain sounds produce sensation of specific colours, and vice versa. The impression of daffodils is more than visual; it is auditory also. For scarlets are a blast from brazen cornets, and yellows produce the note of a silver trumpet. But the effect of daffodils is deeper. According to Maeterlinck, beauty is the only language of the soul; and at a time when the woodland is sere and the hedgerows bare, thrice welcome not only the promise of the fairer time in days of dearth, but the holy vision they vouchsafe. Blow! bright yellow trumpets across the land a message of goodwill and peace; irradiate like patines that are wont only to bear the sacred host, food for the soul, ye flaming stars, and call us home from the sombreness and satiety of sin to the gaiety of good!

In the daffodil one realises how "a ray of beauty outvalues all the utilities of the world," for no utilitarian value whatever has been found for it. Hulme declares himself unable to find a single medical reference to it. Valuable enough it is for its own dear sake, and lovelier because beloved by so many great and good. It was one of the treasured images of loveliness of John Keats, one of the predestined. As he moved too rapidly down into the Valley of the Shadow, where the glory of his youth and all its hopes and ardours seemed to suffer eclipse, he clutched at these treasures as a drowning man hugs the nuggets that represent his whole life's gains. But he believed that he should be blessed hereafter by having his happiness on earth "repeated in a finer tone." The very name "daffodil" carries such a suggestion, for being a corruption of asphodel it relates itself to Elysium. Would that other sad eyes, whose daffodils grow where stands an inscribed stone whose story they cannot bear to read, might but know that flowers that bloom over an earthly grave are "repeated in a finer tone" in a fairer summer land, giving radiance to eyes that know neither tears nor sorrow any more.

A NEW LIGHT ON UNEMPLOYMENT.

THE following words appeared lately in a letter in the daily press: "The condition in the labour market of what is called unemployment is simply that of men and women looking for employers with capital—to buy their labour." The writer then went on to ask a question: "Is it not possible to conceive a condition of affairs where masters with capital are obliged to look about for labour to use their capital?" Let the first quotation be considered first. If we ask the man in the street or any ordinary person this question, "What is unemployment?" the answer will be "inability of a man or woman to get a job." Then let us ask him why cannot the man or woman get a job? and the answer will almost certainly be, "Because there are too many men and women wanting work, and there are not enough jobs vacant." One person in a thousand might know enough about industrial conditions to say, "Lack of jobs is the chief cause, but perhaps, in a few special trades needing peculiar skill it might happen that there were not enough highly-skilled workers for the jobs; but this would only happen very occasionally." People are firmly convinced that there are too many people and not enough work. The ardent reformer with his cry of every man's right to work, walks about urging the powers that be to make work for the unemployed. Trade must be organised and reorganised in order that there may always be enough jobs for every man or woman wanting one. This lack of work is regarded as the social problem of the day. If we could supply enough work, the difficulties of the great problem of unemployment would be solved. Now let the question at the beginning of this article be considered. The questioner, doubtless to his surprise, can be shown that there need be no trouble taken to conceive the condition where capital has to look about for labour. The condition is here. Not only does capital have to look about for labour but for all its looking about, capital cannot find labour to do the work it wants done. The fact ought to be patent to the whole of the public, for it is published every month in the Board of Trade Labour Gazette, so that all who run may read. In June and July we read: "The demand for workers exceeded the supply in the case of the coachbuilding, cotton, woollen and worsted trades. In the shipbuilding trade there was a large demand for workmen of all classes, and there was a scarcity of men in painting, decorating and tailoring and of skilled workers in the engineering trade in some districts." From August to January "the demand for workers exceeded the supply in the case of the cotton, woollen and worsted trades. In the shipbuilding trade there was a large demand for workers of all classes, and in the engineering and metal trades there was a scarcity of workers in some districts." Figures are hard facts. Here are a few taken from the Gazette for January, concerning the five weeks ending December 29, 1911.

In Birmingham Labour Exchange 816 vacancies were notified for men; 605 only were filled. But—and it is a large but—there were 1,839 men on the live register at the beginning of the period and 2,744 men applied for employment during the period; and yet 211 vacancies could not be filled.

Take Leeds: 337 vacancies notified, only 239 were filled; and yet 2,758 men wanted work.

Swansea: Vacancies 320, filled 199, and 798 men were on the register.

Barrow: Vacancies 159, filled 140; and 318 men on the register.

Let anyone buy the Labour Gazette and see for himself. All over the country it is the same. There are not the men fitted to take the vacant jobs, and so capital goes about crying for labour.

And what do these figures show? At least one thing—that the demand for skilled workers is greater than the supply. By our senseless system of education we are producing a nation of unskilled labourers, and in the course of a few years trade requiring skilled workers must decline because we cannot produce them at home. Is it not possible to conceive a condition when all our skilled trades will be in the hands of foreign workpeople imported for the purpose? Heaven forbid that we should ever come to such a state of things! While there is yet time let us as a nation start out to find a remedy, and let us take this much as courage. We have made one tentative step towards producing the skilled worker in the conditions concerning learners imposed on employers by the Trade Boards Act, whereby the employer must give every opportunity to the learner to thoroughly learn a trade, and not only one small section of it. But the pity of it is that the Trade Boards Act only applies to four trades at present—chainmaking, the cheaper sorts of lace-making, paper box making, and bespoke tailoring. If it is not possible to apply the minimum time and piece rates to all the many hundreds of trades at present, cannot the learners' conditions out of the Act be made compulsory in all the important trades? It might also be noticed that the unskilled labourer is too unskilled even to be able to take the jobs that are offered to him—capital has again to go begging for labour.

CHRISTIANITY AND COMPREHENSION.

SIR,—Some are come that we might have comprehensiveness, and might have it more abundantly. I deny the whole assumption that comprehension, established as an end, is good. It is empty of meaning to me, a vain striving after wind. We are asked to believe that comprehensiveness and Free Catholicism are synonyms. Is this true? Catholicism is a term embedded in the history of European civilisation. We trace it through two thousand years of our history. During the whole of this period it stands for a particular and exclusive life penetrating and leavening society. Mr. Roberts uproots this divine growth, thrusts it into his retort, and passes it off into the thin air of comprehensiveness.

In reply, I adopt the proposition that where there is no affinity there can be no inclusion, and I maintain that the practice of the Universe of Man proves my rule. The instinct for self-preservation has established this proposition as a law of society. Its fundamental validity is recognised by Modernist and Free Catholic alike. Catholicism has its own peculiar content, and is a life grounded on a root-idea. That root-idea is not comprehensiveness. Out of that root-idea there has grown a Catholic attitude to life and to society, and this attitude is exclusive of all its antagonisms because believed by those who adopt it to be the highest realised manifestation of immanent Divinity. The Modernist does not deny the authority or tradition. He demands that both must serve and not stifle the life of the Church. The Free Catholicism of Mr. Roberts is quite off the track of the Modernist movement, since it virtually destroys the Church. The priests who wrote an open letter to Pius X. say: "For us, profoundly Christian souls, religion, far from being a vague, mystical feeling which soothes the spirit and isolates it in a barren egoism, is a Divine reality, which kindles into life and exalts the souls of men, and, knitting them together in a bond of brotherhood, directs their life towards a supreme and common goal. For us, Christianity is the highest expression of religion thus conceived."

Beyond the fact that Modernists are in the Roman Communion and Free Catholics stand without, I do not find any differences between them worth considering. When a Catholic says he is "Free," he does not mean he is free from Catholicism, but intent upon securing the unhindered development of the Catholic life, and therefore free from the absolutism of the Intellectualist behind the Papal chair. The Modernist is endeavouring to procure this freedom; and the Free Catholic, on his part, would in general subscribe to the Open Letter, certainly where it says, "As Christians, we accept the authority of the Church, as the careful dispenser of the deposit of eternal truth inherited from Christ, to regulate and govern our religious life, and to interpret and supply its living needs and claims." Mr. Roberts recognises Modernists and Free Catholics as men with common aims when he calls the late leader of English Modernism a Free Catholic "Christian." Anyone studying the literature of Modernism will know its objective is not that of Mr. Roberts. Bare comprehensiveness as a basis of religious solidarity is a castle in the air. "All and sundry" can never become a brotherhood.

I believe the Modernist conception of the Church to be invulnerable, and Modernism must win. The Pope is paralysed. He asked his cardinals "Whether we . . . have not reason to be in anguish in presence of this attack." He is panic-stricken. He asked them to "defend the truth even to the shedding of blood." [April 17, 1907.] In the meantime let us build up the Faith and avoid side tracks.

THE COAL STRIKE AND A MINIMUM WAGE.

SIR,—I should esteem it a privilege if you would insert this letter in reference to "the principle of a minimum wage." As far as I can gather, the general view of the public as indicated in the Press, is that the collier ought to have a wage which is sufficient for his maintenance in average comfort. But that is not the meaning attached to the words "minimum wage" by those who manage the Miners' Federation. In coal mines a large number of those employed (in South Wales about one-half) are paid a daily wage which has been fixed by agreement between the men, the employers, and the Trades Unions, and its sufficiency is not questioned at the present time. The other men are contractors, who undertake to get coal at piece work rates. These men, like all other contractors, take a risk: sometimes they make very high and sometimes low wages. The prices paid have been fixed by agreement between the three parties above named and, the prices so fixed rise and fall with the average county sale price of the coal, between a fixed minimum and maximum percentage (that is, between 30 and 60 per cent.) above the basis price. At the present time the rate is about 50 per cent. above the basis price on which the contractors worked when the present piece work rates were first fixed. It is not denied that on the average the contractors make good wages. I don't think it can be denied that, having regard to all the conditions of work, their housing accommodation, rent, and cost of the necessities and pleasures of life, the healthiness and (accidents notwithstanding) the longevity of the men engaged, on the whole they are the best paid men in Great Britain, taking into account only the larger classes of manual labourers, and it may even be argued that they are the best paid men in the world. If a contractor engages a man or men to help him at a fixed daily wage, he may make a profit or a loss on their labour. Now the present demand is that when he makes a handsome profit he shall keep it for himself, and when he makes a loss he shall transfer that loss to the colliery owner; "heads I win, tails you lose" is the demand of these men, backed by a very powerful organisation of Trade Unions. When the Federation Jupiter frowns, the colliery manager trembles; when the Prime Minister threatens an Act of Parliament to enforce this demand, the holder of colliery shares or debentures turns pale. These contractors could get a daily wage at Trade Union rates if they liked (say, 7s. a day), but for the most part they would treat the offer with contempt.

Certainly I would not blame the men, or the employers, or anybody, on account of this strike. But if people who are suffering from want of coal at the present time want to blame somebody, I would recall an ancient parable about some foolish virgins who went to sleep and neglected to provide a stock of fuel for their lamps; and I would express a hope that such folly will never again be repeated in this country, but that all consumers of coal will, in future, provide and maintain a sufficient store, and that private stocks should be supplemented by municipal stocks; and then the British collier will be able to carry on his "war against capital" in the shape of pits, engines, houses, railways, &c., without too much disturbing the rest of the community. The best way out of the present difficulty is for the Government to leave the employers and miners to settle the matter; the men have only been persuaded to strike by the statement of their spokesmen that the Government would interfere in the dispute by Act of Parliament. Let the Government try to maintain order; if it can do that, the men will gradually go back to work.

In the meantime, to meet the pressing needs of poor people, bakers and others, the Government might import some coal from Germany and the United States. Those two countries between them produce more than 50 million tons of coal a month, and now that the winter is over, can easily spare us some coal at a price. If this is arranged by telegraph there will soon be plenty of coal in our ports, and on the hearths of the poor people who might otherwise suffer.—Your obedient servant,

ARNOLD LUPTON.

7, Victoria-street, Westminster,
March 4.

SIR,—In the third paragraph of "Notes of the Week," in your last issue, you put forward a view of the action of the miners which I should be extremely pleased to have substantiated, and to be able to agree with myself

If this strike can be shown to be an unselfish strike, a strike by one body of men for the benefit of another body, whom they consider to be ill-paid, oppressed, or unfairly treated in any way, I shall begin to think that we are at the dawn of a new era.

You make this claim of unselfishness in four statements, one negative and three positive, which I take the liberty of giving in my own order:

(1) The movement is not in the interests of well-paid labour.

(2) It is a plea for the rights of the bottom dog.

(3) It is a case of the strong coming to the help of the weak.

(4) There is a fine element of chivalry in their action.

To the first statement, one cannot, of course, give a flat denial, as scarcely any two persons agree as to when labour is well paid, but I contend that in comparison with very many people who will help to pay any advance in miners' wages, the miners are fairly well paid.

As I am not sure of the meaning you attach to the term "bottom dog," considering also that the second assertion is practically included in the third, and that the fourth follows if the third be admitted; allow me to say that I fail to find anything in the miners' demands in the way of "the strong helping the weak."

To justify your view, I should say that the strong men would have to take the hard places and leave the easy places for the weak and aged; or, as the differences in wages depend on the working-places quite as much as on strength, the strong or fortunate, or strong and fortunate, would have to forfeit a portion of their wages to supplement the wages of the weak or unfortunate, or weak and unfortunate.

Nothing of this kind is proposed, however; what is proposed, if I understand the matter rightly, is that, if a miner does not earn at the current rate per ton a certain minimum wage, he shall be paid that minimum wage irrespective of the amount of coal he is able to hew. And, be it remembered, every miner stands to gain by this proposal, as a working-place where he can earn 10s. or 12s. a day may, in the course of a few weeks, worsen so much that only 5s. or 6s. can be earned at tonnage rates.

Truly, as you say, the inconvenience and suffering of the strike will not be cured by wild and whirling words, but, as I have tried to show, your own words seem to me somewhat wild and unduly optimistic.

In conclusion, while I make no prophecy as to how the strike will be settled; it would, in my opinion, be settled in a reasonably short time if we could have from both sides "words of truth and soberness," touched, even ever so lightly, by Christian charity.—Yours, &c.,

T. STEVENSON.

49, St. Helen's-road, Bolton,
March 6, 1912.

SIR,—Though I hold views that are radical and even revolutionary, I cannot but think the miners have been misled, and the coal strike a gigantic blunder worse than a crime. To tamper with the necessities of life, seems to me quite outside the pale of possible methods. I have said in the pulpit, and say it here again, that men who make a corner in wheat and gamble with the food supplies of the world thereby make themselves enemies of the human race. And the agitators who, with whatsoever honest intentions, trifle with a necessary of life like coal, become ipso facto the enemies of their country, and place themselves beyond the laws of pity and protection. Concessions bought at such a price, if ever granted, will prove a curse, and not a blessing, and retard for generations the march of progress. A general strike like this is practically an appeal to terrorism and brute force. And, as John Bright declared, force can never be a remedy.—Yours, &c.

"THE INQUIRER" AND PUBLIC MORALS.

SIR,—We all know you to be an honourable man—"who sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not"—and I note with the more surprise, therefore, that never once in your paper do you rebuke—as you ought, I venture to think, rebuke—those who break agreements for their own advantage.

The complaint you make is against such of the coal-owners as are not prepared to accept the measure thrust upon them by the Government, yet you must surely know that their protest, or at all events the protest of the chief section of them, is not against a minimum wage as such, but against a barefaced breach of a solemn agreement. Quite lately terms were definitely come to between the coal-owners and the miners of South Wales which were to be in force until 1915, if I mistake not. Now the miners in that district ignore their contract, with what I presume you would call (vide last week's INQUIRER) "a fine element of chivalry," without even a gentle shake of the head from you.

Were the Welsh miners to say, "Yes, we want an alteration, but we have agreed to certain terms and must abide by them," would the owners decline to meet them fairly, or would public opinion tolerate it if they did? But the miners toss their agreements aside as a thing of no moment, and a religious journal treats their action as a matter of course.

We all know you to be an honest man, yet never once in your paper have I seen a protest from you against the proposed national robbery of a section of the Church. Disestablishment may be a question for argument: disendowment cannot be, so long as the slightest regard is paid to a right acquired by length of possession, especially when that right is not abused.

If enjoyment for upwards of two hundred and fifty years is not enough to give the Church an unassailable claim, our title to a large proportion of our endowments stands on a precarious footing indeed.

The moral principles of THE INQUIRER in public matters would almost appear to be as nebulous as the religious system it delights to advocate.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN C. WARREN.

THE PROBLEM OF THE BLIND.

SIR,—In reference to what is called the Problem of the Blind, Sir Francis Campbell, the Principal and the Chief Superintendent of the Royal Normal College and Academy for the Blind, Upper Norwood, has recently made some valuable statements which appear to go to the very source of the difficulty. The prime problem is how to compensate the blind for the loss of that sense which is the greatest, the most vital and vitalising, and the most blessed of all the senses. Its failure must, to some extent, mean either the loss or else the lessening of the vital consciousness. This is the spiritual problem. The material and the financial issues involve the training of the blind, in the face of their incapacity, so that they may take their part in the common, practical employments, upon an equality with their sighted competitors, and fully share both in the rewards and the responsibilities of social and industrial life. Sir Francis Campbell has devoted his whole life to the education and the welfare of the blind, and the bettering of their position. It has been recognised that not only the blind but that all men have their limitations, and their separate and individual capabilities. Every man should be trained for and follow those pursuits for which he must be peculiarly fitted. Everything depends upon his power to take advantage of his peculiar talents and specific training. Sir Francis Campbell makes a proud boast when he maintains that a blind student trained at the Upper Norwood School has been so well educated that he or she must prove a better worker than even his or her sighted rival. One can imagine that even this result might be attained through some system of education which would be absolutely scientific in its concentration.

The next statement made by Sir Francis Campbell is even more significant. He says that the greatest hindrance to the advancement of the interests of blind people is the fact that the whole world is more or less unconsciously against them. This may seem strange at first. The blind in many cases have realised its truth through their own unhappy experience. This does not apply to the blind alone, but to all those who suffer from any ostensible incapacity. Examples might be given of the deaf and the dumb, the crippled and the stunted, the weaklings, and those set aside through their stature or their age. A short girl is not accepted as a Post Office clerk, but she could probably sell stamps quite as well as a tall girl. We have all heard the painful complainings of men set aside through their advanced age at a time when they feel that their mental and industrial capacities are as alert and active as they ever were at any time in their lives. The spirit of self-preservation has its aggressive side. No one cares for cripples. Harold Skimpole was not alone in shrinking from the sight and even the thought of illness and infirmity. It is never pleasant to see suffering or to be with those in pain. The spirit of the survival of the fittest makes it natural to be unnatural and human to be inhuman. This is really a very healthy tendency, but it makes life very difficult for the afflicted. Sir Francis Campbell says that the best possible way of helping the blind is to give them employment. Those pupils whom he himself has trained have, in many cases, been more skilful and more industrious and conscientious than the sighted fellow-workers with whom they have been associated.—Yours, &c.,

E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.

We called attention last week to the important proposal made by the Divinity professors at Cambridge in favour of admitting qualified men to Divinity degrees without any theological test. The Council of the Senate have now reported that they would welcome the proposed alteration of the Statute. They accordingly recommend that the necessary steps be taken to amend the Statutes to enable laymen and ministers other than those belonging to the Church of England to be admitted.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

PROFESSOR JAMES WARD'S GIFFORD LECTURES.

The Realm of Ends; or Pluralism and Theism. By James Ward, Sc.D. (Camb.), Hon. LL.D. (Edin.), Hon.D.Sc. (Oxon.). Cambridge: The University Press. 12s. 6d. net.

As many of our readers are aware, the Gifford Lectureship is an institution founded in the four Scottish Universities by the late Adam Gifford, a Lord of Session, or Scottish Judge. By the terms of the foundation, a course of twenty lectures is to be given every two years in each University, the subject being "Natural Theology," which the lecturers may treat just as they please. Notwithstanding the remarkable freedom allowed—which does great credit to the founder's breadth of view—the lecturers have, as a rule, followed a few well-worn tracks. We venture to think that the treatment has been too often merely historical. There are, however, a number of outstanding exceptions; and amongst these Professor Ward's recent courses at St. Andrews must be given a distinguished place. The University of St. Andrews is to be congratulated on having drawn forth this extremely able pronouncement on the fundamental problems involved in theistic belief. We feel bound to say, however, that the price of the volume seems to us to be excessively high.

In a review like the present one we can only give an outline of the method of treatment adopted by Professor Ward. The argument starts from the position arrived at in the writer's previous Gifford Lectures on "Naturalism and Agnosticism," delivered in Aberdeen ten years ago. The realm of non-human Nature and the realm of Ends or Purposes—the mechanical and the moral—are contrasted "aspects" of one world. Naturalism holds the former to be fundamental, spiritualism (in the philosophical sense of the word) holds the latter to be fundamental. The defence of the spiritualistic position, as previously argued, is assumed. The recognition of experience as a duality in unity points to spiritual monism. Hence the problem of the present work is "to ascertain what we can know, or reasonably believe, concerning the constitution of the world, interpreted throughout and strictly in terms of mind."

The author holds that we must start from the "pluralistic" position, which assumes no fundamental unity in the world of men and things, because it is from this standpoint that our experience has developed, and it is here that we acquire the ideas which eventually lead us beyond it. The first half of the book is occupied with the proof that pluralism, though it has a certain empirical warrant, is defective and unsatisfactory. The second part discusses the theism to which pluralism points, and seeks to show that though this theism is only an ideal, "it is an ideal which, as both theoretically and practically rational, may claim our faith though it transcend our knowledge."

The fundamental topics discussed in the first part are "The Contingency of the World"; "Evolution as Epigenesis (or creative synthesis), and Equilibration"; "The Pluralistic Goal" (Society as a living reality, though a complex and "over-individual" one); "The Limits of Pluralism" (where it is urged that no light is thrown by mere pluralism on its lower or upper limit—on the beginning or the consummation—hence the demand for a Primum Movens connecting both limits). "We have," says the author, "the type of a higher unity in our own experience as self-conscious subjects. Here there is a unity which is more than the world of objects—a unity to which all this belongs and refers. Now, remove from such an experience its 'relativity' (its partial and fragmentary character), and you approach the theistic ideal of an absolute experience, the experience of a living and acting spirit 'whose centre is everywhere, whose circumference is nowhere,' an experience complete at all points and including every one. The pluralist's universe in the light of this transcendent being would thus have a unity which it would otherwise lack. Not only, so, but such active presence of the One Spirit, Who alone knows all, affords—manifestly—an assurance that the pluralist's ideal will be attained, an assurance which we have had to allow must else be wanting." (P. 229.)

The argument is essentially that theism completes pluralism without abolishing it; theism provides theoretically more unity in the ground of the world, and practically a higher and fuller unity in its meaning and end. The divine process of creation is explained as a self-limitation, but a limitation which is "internal" in the sense that God in creating finite beings not only has determined Himself, but has so determined Himself that the finite beings are themselves creative. The difficulties arising from finite freedom are met by the contention that, while the total possibilities, however far back we go, are fixed, yet within these, however far forward we go, contingencies arise. Finally, the great question which is the centre of all that we mean by the problem of evil—"Why have we not a better world?"—is met by the contention that the only way to reach this better world is by living through worlds that are less good.

We have been able to give only slight indications of the numerous concrete problems which in this book receive suggestive and convincing discussion.

VILLAGE LIFE IN INDIA.

Life in an Indian Village. By T. Ramakrishna, B.A. With an Introduction by the Rt. Hon. Sir M. E. Grant Duff, K.C.S.I. New Edition. T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.

In this little book, which first saw the light over twenty years ago, Mr. Ramakrishna gives us a simple and sympathetic picture of the life of an Indian village such as perhaps none but a native of India could have produced. "A chiel among them takin' notes," he has given us in small compass a gallery of peasant portraits and an estimate of the being and needs of the rural community which are full of significance to the Englishman who bestows a thought on the welfare of our great Eastern Dependency. Moreover, Sir M. E. Grant Duff, who was formerly Governor of Madras, testifies to the accuracy of the picture as it applies to some fifty-five thousand similar villages scattered over a province much larger than the British Isles.

The first thing that strikes us is that the typical South Indian village, with its three hundred or so inhabitants, is, as the author says, "a little world in itself," self-contained, self-existent, and even governing itself. A cluster of tamarind, cocoanut and other fruitful trees, beside which is a cluster of fifty or sixty dwellings thatched or tiled, a belt of five hundred green acres and a tank big enough to water them for six months, is what we see. Every member of this little state has duties assigned to him which he performs as a matter of course, and "everything works like a machine." But how much better than a machine where a score or two of distinct services are rendered by accredited persons, from the headman to the potter, from the schoolmaster and the priest to the barber and the dancing girl. What a contrast to the average English village, which commonly in these days has degenerated to a mere collection of farm labourers' or miners' cottages, with a school, a public-house, and a small post office shop; but with no real spirit of civic cohesion, and, even in agricultural districts, largely dependent for its maintenance on the daily visits of the butcher and baker and other tradesmen from neighbouring towns. In the days of Alfred the Great a village society analogous to that in India, perhaps, existed in England, but Enclosure Acts, squirearchy, roads, railways, and other means by which civilisation has progressed in the West, have in some measure brought about the undoing of English rural life, and especially have broken up the self-contained village community. Whether, on the whole, for good or for ill, this is not the place to argue. But we cannot resist entertaining doubts as to whether we could candidly say of our British peasantry, as a whole, and bearing in mind the exactions of landlordism, the insufficiency and unwholesomeness of cottage homes, the discontent and repulsive ugliness of mining villages, not to speak of Irish cabins and Scotch crofts, that "these simple, honest villagers earn their livelihood, year after year, by toiling hard from early morning till close of day, leading a peaceful and contented life, living happily with their wives and children in their humble cottage homes." But this is what we should like to say.

We are not blinded to the existence of some inevitable frailties of human nature, but there is presented an idyllic picture of rural life in the East. The secret of it, as Mr. Ramakrishna points out, is the system of mutual service that prevails. The British rule, in some respects so salutary, has introduced the convenience, hitherto unknown to Indian ryots, of money. In its place, each man did what each man could for the welfare of all, receiving benefit of other's service in return—an annual portion of grain at harvest, or the use of land rent free being the only other kinds of compensation.

Money has already become the source of much trouble, inasmuch as it has brought the moneylender, and as Government taxes have to be paid in coin, the usurer in a moneyless land has become an indispensable incubus. He must be got rid of by the institution of agricultural banks or credit societies lending money on good security at low interest. This, too, is one of the greatest needs in our own country districts. Wherever credit societies have been adopted they have been a new source of prosperity and contentment; and what has been effected, in conjunction with other forms of co-operation, with such success in Denmark and in Ireland may also be accomplished by this great instrument for good in India.

India has much to teach us even in her villages, where the majority of her people dwell. She may also learn with advantage some things of us. The English countryman often has a wide knowledge of politics and of the great world; he is not as his Eastern brother, who cares for nothing that goes on beyond his own little village. But in habits of co-operation and mutual service, and not less, as we venture to think, in the penetrating spirit of religion and of poetry the balance lies with the East.

UTOPIA ONCE MORE.

Kalomera: The Story of a Remarkable Community. By W. J. Saunders. London: Messrs. Elliot Stock. 6s.

THE more man becomes involved in social conditions which seem on the surface to be nothing more than the result of a continuous process of "muddling through," the more wistfully does he turn his thoughts to that Utopia of his dreams in which the most exemplary people live perfect and orderly lives, free from the agony and fret of the struggle for existence as we know it at present. He no longer believes that he can bid Time run back and fetch the age of gold, but he imagines that by taking thought and forming a definite image of the ideal State in his mind, he can build up a community in which every human being shall live a happy, prosperous, and untroubled life. It is all "News from Nowhere" at present, and, in spite of William Morris, H. G. Wells, the author of "Kalomera," and a few others who have fallen victims to the passion for systematising human nature, it is probable that the incalculable forces which make for variability, originality, and growth will for ever defeat the expectations of the Utopists. Nevertheless, their dream of a new order in which poverty, at least, shall be a thing of the past is not without its abiding charm; it has even practical value, for these men are thinkers as well as visionaries, and their theories might well furnish some valuable hints to the sociologist and the politician. The fantastic idea of a universal style of dress (coloured tunics, in Kalomera, with the name of the wearer and of the town he belongs to embroidered thereupon), of homes, land, and money held in common, and co-operative house-keeping at the nation's expense, may commend itself to few at present; but much of our modern social legislation, the town-planning and garden-city movement, the revival of forgotten arts and crafts, folk-dances and peasant industries, point to a time when life, it is to be hoped, will be fairer and pleasanter for the average man and woman than it is now. Mr. Saunders has sketched with much ingenuity and imagination some of the main lines along which he would like, apparently, to see social movements develop in the days to come, and his description of the manner in which one, Joseris, altered "the religion, language, and the whole mode of life" of the Kalomerians may be taken as his prophesy of the part which the great reformer of the future will play when he comes to set the crooked straight. We are supposed to enter this modern Utopia at a time when nearly a hundred years have elapsed "since the death, at an advanced age, of the last man who could remember having lived among the individualists," so it is evident that the reader must look very far ahead! We can promise that some entertainment, and not a few novel and useful ideas will be his reward if he is not discouraged by the long speeches of the very superior people in whose company he will find himself.

HOW TO KEEP YOUNG.

Health for Young and Old. By A. T. Schofield, M.D. Rider. 8s. 6d. net.

"The worst of hygiene is that it makes you so ill," said a man once to Dr. Schofield. In spite of this saying, the truth of which he readily endorses, Dr. Schofield has written in "Health for Young and Old" what is in effect a manual of hygiene. But we do not think it will make any one ill. It is, in fact, a helpful and stimulating book. The writer treats his reader as a friend, and gives him sound advice based on common sense as well as medical experience. This is well seen in the chapter entitled, What to Eat, which, as the author says, will be the chapter of the book to most readers. "Nowhere," he says truly, "does the great army of faddists find a happier and more prolific hunting ground than in food. Here they fairly run riot, and the worst of it is the human powers are so different in this respect that no craze is so crazy, no fad too faddy, but what it can adduce true instances of individuals benefited by it!" Hence the only important questions with regard to a doubtful article of diet are, Do you like it? and Does it like you? In similar bright and unconventional fashion are treated such topics as how to keep young, how to preserve health, how to lose health, what to wear, what to breathe, what to do, &c. Then follows a section on practical hygiene, which gives health precepts for all the stages of life. Dr. Schofield's general attitude—well known to readers of his other books—is indicated in these lines: "Happiness is the best tonic, but it is only eternal when it is based on love Divine. . . It is not in the power of man's body to keep him young. Nor in the power of his soul or animal life. It is by the spirit alone, and the spirit steeped in love, in unison with God, that the strong man becomes a child again and never grows old."

SIX MINOR PROPHETS.

International Critical Commentary. Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Obadiah, Joel. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 12s. 6d.

To review, in any adequate manner, a book of this kind is impossible. It is full of matter, highly technical, and compressed to a degree which makes the task of the reader sometimes by no means easy. It is not, indeed, a book to be read through, but rather a volume of an encyclopædia, whose main subject is the exposition of the Old Testament. Into it is packed everything that the interpreter can need for the right understanding of his text. All the resources of scholarship are used to show what the several writers really said, and what they meant by it, and under what circumstances and with what objects they wrote. But the general reader is warned that he will not find here much that will help him in the untechnical devotional study of the Bible; and he might well be disappointed if he plunged into these dry pages of minute analysis of sentences and comparison of various readings. To the student of Hebrew history and literature the book is invaluable, and is worthy to rank with its predecessors in the great series of the International Critical Commentary. The writers in the present volume are Americans; which perhaps accounts for the fact that on p. 172 occurs the word "athetize," in the sense of "set-aside," "leave out." However, to carp at the style would be to condemn the whole book, for its style is appalling. Its writers have studied use rather than beauty, and they have succeeded in both respects. If that is borne in mind there can be nothing but praise for what they have done.

THE CREDIBILITY OF THE GOSPEL. By Mgr. Pierre Batiffol. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 4s. 6d. net.

THIS volume consists of lectures delivered to an audience of priests and others at Versailles in 1910. It is a very able reply, from the Roman Catholic standpoint, to Reinach's "Orpheus"—a book which has raised the same question in France as Drews' work did in Germany and similar publications have done in this country as to whether the Christ whom the Gospels portray was or was not a historical person. Mgr. Batiffol states the case for the traditional view clearly and forcibly, availing himself of all the help supplied by Harnack's defence of the Lucan authorship of Acts and, generally, of the tendency of recent criticism to give an early rather than a late date to the composition of the Gospels. Naturally he sees in this tendency not only a witness to the credibility of the Gospel, but also a confirmation of ecclesiastical authority. "We can trust the Church of the second century," he says; and, again, "We can trust the Church of all time." Protestant readers cannot say this quite so unreservedly, and they may differ considerably from our author as to the extent to which the Gospels are credible; but on the main question at issue they will find in the work of this scholarly Roman Catholic much with which they can agree, and for which they will be grateful.

LITERARY NOTES.

PROFESSOR ERNST TROELTSCH, of Heidelberg University, is preparing an important work on "The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches." It will review the various denominations and groups of churches, and set forth the relation of Christian ideas and organisations to the solution of the characteristic social problems of the present day. The latter are conceived as the outcome of the bureaucratic military spirit as well as the capitalistic régime, the huge increase of population, and the concentration of population, wealth, and culture in great cities.

THE "Home University Library" and the "Peoples' Books" are ministering to a real and growing need with their inexpensive little volumes on a wide variety of subjects. Messrs. Constable are now entering the field with a series of "Modern Biographies," published at a shilling, and among the titles already announced are "J. M. Synge," by Mr. Francis Bickley; "Lafcadio Hearn," by Mr. E. Thomas; "Hazlitt," by Mr. Walter de la Mare; and "Tolstoy," by Mr. Edward Garnett. The same firm also announce "Labour and the Churches," by Mr. Reginald A. Bray; and "Rationalism," by Mr. J. M. Robertson.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

JOAN OF ARC.
1411-1431.

II.

WHEN Joan, as I told you last week, arrived at Chinon, and entered among the crowd of lords and ladies, though she had never seen the Dauphin before something told her who he was. She knelt down before him saying, "Gentle Dauphin, my name is Joan the maid. The Heavenly King sends me to tell you that you shall be crowned in the town of Rheims, and you shall be lieutenant of the Heavenly King who is the King of France." The Dauphin put her at the head of an army of 4,000 men and they set out for Orleans. Joan rode at the head of the army. She was dressed in white armour from head to foot, and she had a great white banner embroidered with lilies on one side, and on the other a picture of God holding the world in His hand. When she and the army reached Orleans everybody in the town rejoiced, for they had been afraid that they would be starved out by the English, and now they saw some help at hand. The Governor of the town came out to meet Joan and to beg her to help them. She answered him: "I bring you the best aid ever sent to anyone, the aid of the King of Heaven." You see how all through she trusted in God, and not in her own cleverness, nor in the strength of the army.

After a good deal of fighting the forts round the walls were taken one by one, and the army got into the town, partly because the English were afraid of Joan, and thought her a witch. She was wounded by an arrow in all this fighting, and the commander of the army wanted to turn back, but she begged him to hold his ground, and said, "As soon as my standard touches the wall press forward, and you shall enter the fort," and it was so. Think what a brave girl she was, when she was in all that pain herself, to care for nothing but that her army should go on fighting. The first thing she did after she entered Orleans was to go to the great church there and give thanks for the victory, and she cried such tears of joy and gratitude "that all the people wept with her." This happened in the month of May; in the following July she persuaded the Dauphin to go to Rheims to be crowned King in the Cathedral, she herself standing near to him holding the sacred banner. How wonderful it must have been to her to feel that she had done all this, and given France a king again by simply obeying the voice of God when she heard it speak to her! She felt now that she had done all that the voice told her to do, and she begged the King to let her go home to her father and mother again. But he and the Archbishop were so selfish that they would not let her go—they thought she might still be useful to them. They tried first of all to take Paris from the English, but it was no use, and Joan was wounded again in the fighting.

Some time after, in May, just a year from the time when she had entered Orleans, she was taken prisoner at the siege of Compiègne. The Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Luxembourg (who were on our side) actually sold her as a prisoner to the English, and that mean, wretched King, who owed everything to her, did not even try to set her free. In January the English cunningly allowed her to be tried by the Inquisition. Now the Inquisition was a kind of Court of Law held by the Roman Catholic Church, and they were answerable to nobody but the Pope for what they did. And the English knew that if they got the Inquisition to sentence Joan to death, nobody in France could interfere, because they were all such strict Catholics there. The trial went on a long time, and Joan made such wise and sensible answers to all they asked her that they found it difficult to settle what her crime was, and so fell back upon saying that she was a witch and a heretic. A heretic is a person who thinks wrongly about religion, and people in those days used to be fond of calling everybody heretics who did not agree with them. Poor Joan could only say that it was not so, and at last as they grew tired of the length of the trial, they thought of a mean way by which they could have an excuse for condemning her. They took away her ordinary dress which she wore in prison, and put instead of it the man's armour she had worn in the wars, so that she was obliged to put it on. Now as the Roman Catholics thought it a crime for a woman to dress like a man, they had an excuse for sentencing her, and she was condemned to be burnt to death in the market-place of Rouen. Just think how horrible! You know how it hurts if you burn your fingers with a match or in the fire; what must it be to be burnt alive?

But Joan was as brave over this as she had been all her life. When she got to the place where she was to die, all she said was, "Oh, Rouen, I have great fear lest you suffer for my death." Even then, you see, she was not thinking of herself, but of her country. The fire was lit, and she stood there and was burnt to death without crying out or reproaching her enemies. Her last words were, "Yes, my Voices (that's to say, the voices of the Saints) were from God." As the crowd broke up and went home, someone heard an English soldier say, "We are lost—we have burnt a Saint." And he was right. Twenty years later, after more fighting, England lost all her possessions in France except the one town of Calais, so that what Joan of Arc began ended as she would have wished it to end. And the more we think of her the more we see that she was a Saint for her goodness and her courage. All her wisdom came from God, and that is why she was so strong, and why I want you to remember her by this verse: "It is God that girdeth me with strength of war and maketh my way perfect." I think, too, that being such a good girl when she lived at home prepared her for what was to come after. No idle or lazy girl could have done what she did, because lazy people are generally cowardly, and hate trouble and pain. If we want to do anything great (though few people have the chance of doing anything as great as Joan of Arc) we must remember that it is the little things that matter. Nobody who is careless about little things can do what is great, and Joan was so brave when the time came that needed bravery because all her life she had tried to live so as to please God.

Perhaps some boys think that girls have not much courage—that they are ready to cry out when they are hurt, and can't bear hardships. If so, let them think of Joan of Arc, and ask themselves if they could have acted as bravely as she did. Think how brave she was in battle, and at her death, when it must have been doubly hard to be brave, for she must have felt so weak and ill after all those months in prison by herself far away from all her relations. The English, too, were so cruel that they would not even let her see a priest or hear one of the services of the church, which would have been a comfort to her. We English cannot be proud of the way we treated her, but the French ought to be even less so, for she was their own countrywoman who had done all this to help them, and yet they gave her up to her enemies. Perhaps you wonder whether it was worth while for her to go through all she did, if in the end she died and her enemies seemed to get the best of it. But it was not so—it was she in reality who got the best of it, for she felt that she had been doing God's will, and knew in the end that she had been right. And then, too, there is another great thing. Anybody who lives such a noble life and dies such a brave death as hers helps everyone else in the world, for we can never read of such a life and death without wishing to be braver and better ourselves. So she has done good to thousands of people who have lived after her and whom she never saw, and we may all do good in this way, if we do the best we can in our lives, though they may not be written down in history like Joan of Arc's.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

JAPANESE NOTES.

THOSE of us who had the pleasure of knowing Mr. S. Uchigasaki when he was studying at Manchester College, Oxford, will notice with great satisfaction the diligence and ability which he is now displaying in religious work in his native land. Recently, a handsomely illustrated volume was issued by him at Tokyo containing an account (of course, in Japanese) of his experiences and observations in England, Germany, Hungary and elsewhere. To the monthly Rikugo Zasshi, a magazine issued by the Unitarian Society at Tokyo, he is a frequent contributor. The Japan Weekly Mail assists our Western ignorance by supplying (February 3) a summary of Mr. Uchigasaki's article in the January issue. He expresses himself as most of all impressed with "the general dissatisfaction with orthodox teaching, and the growth of sentiment in favour of union on broad lines. Dogmas and special doctrines taught by certain sects are being relegated to a subordinate place, and religious earnestness combined with brotherly love are all that is required. Unitarianism today is no longer mere anti-Trinitarianism as it used to be, but stands for union of various kinds, the union of East and West, the union of the world's great religions, the union of heaven, earth, and man." In another column the same journal says, "Mr. Uchigasaki, who only returned from Oxford last autumn, has taken to writing magazine articles with great zest. The January numbers of the Shinjin, the Shin Nihon, the To-A-no Hikari, and the Michi, all publish articles from his pen." The subjects vary, but the religious interest dominates. In the Michi, for instance, he writes urging that Japanese colonists in other countries should not continue their present practice of religious isolation, confining themselves to loyalty to the Emperor and patriotism, but should give and take religious ideas, imparting the best in Buddhism and welcoming Christian approaches. He maintains, however, that while the preaching of Christianity to Japanese living in the West is an urgent necessity, the usual evangelical methods are too disjointed to be effectual, and he would like to see a union of Protestant sects to undertake this work.

As evidences of the stirrings of new thought in Japan we notice other recent publications. Groups of educated writers have just published, in an influential magazine, a series of articles on Shaka (the Buddha), Christ, Socrates, and Confucius. Apparently, Shaka's influence is waning among the Japanese, the name of Christ is little known beyond the missions, that of Socrates still less, while Confucius and his teaching are more influential than a generation ago.

It is interesting to notice that the Government is endeavouring to promote the religious life of the country by co-operation between Shintoism, Buddhism, and Christianity, but grave doubts are expressed by Japanese writers as to this being possible. They observe the rich inheritance of rites and traditions in each of the three historical religions, and see little chance of sufficient concessions to render co-operation feasible. A material difficulty lies in the fact that Shinto and Buddhist priests have already an official status denied to Christians; the Government would have either to level up or level down, and each course would be extremely perilous for the success of the plan. A new Christian Alliance has just been formed representing "eight Protestant sects"; but, when we discover that not only the Universalists and Unitarians are unrepresented, but also the Episcopalians and the Baptists, the scheme certainly seems imperfect still. The Japanese Unitarians, we learn, have resolved to change their name and stand forth as the "United Church."

A LIBERAL CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT IN ITALY.

DR. C. W. WENDTE has contributed the following interesting article on the work of the Rev. Gaetano Conte, in Italy, in connection with the Italian Association of Free Believers, to the Christian Register—

Italian Association of Free Believers (Associazione Italiana di Liberi Credenti) is the title of the society recently formed by the Rev. Gaetano Conte and others to advance the influence of liberal Christian principles in Italy. This Association is as yet modest in numbers and activities, but full of promise. Its centre is at Florence, but it has branch committees at Venice, Milan, Rome, and Palermo, and members in many other communities. Its founder and inspiring soul, Signor Conte, is of Roman Catholic origin, but was converted in early manhood to Protestant principles, and for over twenty years served as Methodist pastor in various cities in Italy and also in the United States. During his pastorate over an Italian congregation in Boston he came in contact with Unitarians and other Liberals. These greatly influenced his own views and led to his later withdrawal from the Methodist body and open espousal of Liberal Christianity, for which he believes Italy is ripe, and which is the only form of faith that can solve its religious problems and meet its spiritual needs. Mr. Conte has no quarrel with any of the existing churches in Italy, and is thankful for whatever good they may accomplish. He is on good terms with the Waldensians and admires their spirit, while unable to accept their theology. He especially sympathises with the Modernist Catholic clergy, with some of whom he is in active communication. He confers with the Theosophists, who are increasing rapidly in Italy. He has recently preached several times for the Baptists. It was pleasant to meet at his house the presiding elder and local preacher of the Methodists, come to consult him on certain denominational affairs. Dr. André endorses his methods and intelligent zeal. A man of sweet spirit and affectionate and genial disposition, of remarkable unselfishness and devotion to his ideals, Signor Conte is nobly seconded in his endeavours by his gifted wife and faithful and talented children. To his own large family he has added the education and care of several little homeless girls, saving them from a life of shame and misery. It would be difficult to find a more hard-working, united, affectionate, and consecrated household.

The purpose of the new Association of Free Believers is to promote the scientific study of religion and ethics, to provide for the widest liberty of conscience, to increase sympathy between religious believers of every shade of opinion, and to diffuse a rational and ethical conception of Christianity. It does not seek to found another church or sect, but to prepare the way for such a worship as may hereafter justify itself to free and believing minds. It is indigenous. Its committee is composed entirely of Italians, and its appeal is to men and women of that race. For the present it will thankfully accept any material or moral help from other lands that may aid it in initiating its campaign for religious enlightenment and liberality, but its aim is to become entirely self-supporting as soon as may be.

Mr. Conte serves without a salary, depending for his support and his family's on two pensions conducted at Venice (234 San Gregorio) and at Florence (44 Viale Margherita). The funds bestowed on his movement are faithfully devoted to its propaganda. The latter is of a twofold nature—the spoken word and the printed page. Once a month a pamphlet of forty to fifty pages is issued, containing a set discourse or article on a living topic by some competent free religious thinker (Brooke Herford and M. J. Savage among them), followed by shorter articles, correspondence, notes, &c. The next two numbers will treat of Ochino and the Socini, the Italian founders of Liberal Christian faith. Once in three months a little paper in English is also issued. These journals are sent with admirable system to two thousand selected addresses all over Italy, and are securing permanent subscribers and adherents of the Association itself, besides sowing the good seed of liberal religion in many communities.

Signor Conte also visits the principal cities of Italy to make addresses, gain members, form local branches, and spread the light. In Venice we had the pleasure of addressing his local committee, composed of thoughtful and free-minded men, men who are religious as well as radical in their opinions. This branch has arranged for three public meetings in conjunction with the Democratic League and the Christian Socialists, to be addressed by the ex-priest and Parliamentary Deputy, Don Romolo Murri, by Signor Conte, and others.

The Association of Free Believers lays especial stress on social work, and has engaged from the first in a crusade against certain notorious evils in Italian society, the vending of lottery tickets, the dishonesty of current trade methods, the prevalence of begging, the inhumanity towards animals, the vice of intemperance, the want of personal cleanliness and sanitation, the widespread illiteracy, bad housing, the debasing consequences of giving tips, and the absence of public spirit among all classes. It is attempting to make the public libraries of the country more accessible to the people by securing the repeal of the burdensome restrictions which now practically limit their use to the few. Thus in Florence and Venice the average of daily readers ranges from 25 to 100. Compare this with London or Boston.

In short, Mr. Conte's work is largely conceived and faithfully pursued. His systematic methods are commendable, his spirit is generous and ardent. He ought to receive the indorsement and support of all who believe in the principles and methods he represents. His prophet and leader in this work is Mazzini, whose writings, it may be said in passing, are being issued in a splendid edition in sixty volumes by the Italian Government, and whose is a name to conjure with in Italy. The present writer urges all who desire to see Liberal Christian principles prevail in Italy to send their Godspeed and their contributions to the Rev. Gaetano Conte, at 44 Viale Margherita, Florence, and to remember the pensions of the Misses Conte when next they visit Italy.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS' FORWARD MOVEMENT.

A GREAT impetus has been given to the Sunday School Teachers' Forward Movement in Birmingham by the course of lectures on "Life in Palestine at the Time of Jesus," which Dr. Carpenter has delivered at the University on the last six Wednesday evenings. A scheme which has for its object the founding of a permanent University Lectureship for Sunday school teachers of all denominations and all religious beliefs, is being urgently put forward, and the interesting course which has been given by Dr. Carpenter has been so well attended, and so highly appreciated, that it is hoped the most cordial support will be given to the movement. The capital sum required to found the Lectureship is being raised by pence subscription, 150,000 pence being needed. When the full amount is realised, it will be possible for every Sunday school superintendent not only to ask his teachers to attend the course, but to supply them with a ticket of admission. It is intended that an examination should follow, and diplomas be granted to successful students, and in this way the general efficiency and influence of the teachers will be greatly increased. The interdenominational character of the movement is well illustrated by the fact that the Right. Hon. Alderman Kenrick, the Rev. Canon W. H. Carnegie, Mr. J. Hilton, President of the Birmingham Sunday School Union; the Rev. Charles Deeble, Alderman Lloyd, and Professor Alfred Hughes have acted as chairmen at Dr. Carpenter's lectures. Mr. Hilton took the place of Dr. Tasker, Principal of Handsworth Wesleyan College, who was unable to be present owing to illness. The Rev. Thos. Paxton has again acted as secretary.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The annual congregational gathering of Richmond Hill Church was held on February 29, the chair being occupied by the minister, the Rev. N. J. Hawthorne Jones, who gave an address dealing with the message of the church at the present time. The Rev. Walter Short, of Stalybridge, also spoke, and a miscellaneous musical programme followed.

Belfast.—The annual meeting of the friends and subscribers of the Domestic Mission to the Poor was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, on March 4, the Rev. H. J. Rossington presiding. Miss C. Bruce submitted the annual report, and Mr. F. Woolley, missionary, also submitted his report, which stated their work was progressing on the right lines. The attendance at the Sunday evening services averaged 110 during the year, and the morning services also showed an increase, the average attendance being 60. The Sunday school was progressing extremely well. The Rev. R. Nichol Cross, in supporting the motion for the adoption of the report, said he would like to congratulate the missionary on the account which he had presented of the activities that had been carried on. In Belfast they had a high tradition to maintain in regard to the work of that Mission, which was worthy of support both from the point of view of the churches and of the people to whom they ministered. He believed that such work was for the good of the churches, none of which could be in a healthy condition if its members—those of them who could, at any rate—did not take their share in carrying on the work of the Gospel. Poor people with big families and slender incomes needed encouragement and help from above. They required the personal touch of the missionary, who could give them advice when in difficulties, lift their eyes above the sordid details which were harassing and annoying them, and remind them that there was a blue sky above their heads, though the clouds obscured it. He agreed with Mr. Woolley as to the worthiness of the people whom the Mission assisted, and he hoped that it would go on and prosper and continue to perform its efficient work. Mr. H. Erskine moved a resolution acknowledging very cordially the services of Mr. and Mrs. Woolley, which was seconded by the Rev. J. Worthington. A vote of thanks to the voluntary workers, in particular Dr. Malcolm Brice Smith, for having kindly acted as medical adviser, was also passed.

Bury St. Edmunds.—Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., addressed a meeting at the Town Hall when he visited Bury St. Edmunds last week, taking the "National Insurance Act" as his subject. Mr. Thomas Ridley, J.P., presided. Mr. Chancellor also addressed the Bury Fellowship in Bank-street Chapel on Sunday afternoon on "The Economics of Temperance," and preached at the evening service on "The Freedom of Faith."

Halstead.—The annual meeting of the congregation of the Free Christian Church, Halstead, was held on March 3. It was resolved unanimously that after Easter the service should be held in the afternoon instead of the evening. This will enable lay preachers from London to return the same day.

Leeds: The late Mrs. John Craven.—The death took place of Mrs. Craven, widow of the late Mr. John Craven, at Carlton Lodge, Leeds, on March 1. Mrs. Craven had been connected with Mill-hill Chapel, of which her husband, father (Sir Edwin Gaunt), and father-in-law (Mr. Joseph Craven) were all members, for more than thirty-five years, and she was associated with various institutions of the church until advancing years and uncertain health curtailed her activities. The funeral took place last Monday, the Rev. C. Hargrove officiating. In the course of his address he said, as he thought of all the long years he had known Mrs. Craven, it seemed to him that the one word he might best apply to her life was that of an eminent statesman—strenuous. The daughter of a father who was distinguished in Leeds, of which he had been twice Mayor, she herself abode in that quiet position in which she had been placed, but, from the earliest days of her life she was a strenuous worker; strenuous in helping her father to build up a great business; strenuous as the wife of an ironmaster. Strenuous as the mother of boys to whom she was devoted; strenuous when her father—aged, infirm and helpless—was drawing nigh to death; strenuous as daughter, wife and widow, she held on to the last, and faced death cheerfully and fearlessly.

Liverpool: Boys' Own Brigade.—A church parade of the companies forming the Liverpool Battalion was held on Sunday, March 3, at Hamilton-road Mission. The two companies, numbering 74 boys and 16 officers, were under the command of Mr. A. C. McCann, who has recently been appointed Major of the Battalion. The Rev. J. L. Haigh, who is both Captain and Chaplain of No. 8 Company, conducted the service and gave the address. The parade was the largest which has taken place so far, and this indicates that the movement is not slackening. Arrangements are already being made for the summer camp under canvas at Kirk Michael, in the Isle of Man, in July.

London: Guilds' Union.—About 80 members of the Union, representing Blackfriars, Highgate, Ilford, Essex Church, Mansford-street, and Stratford, assembled at Mansford-street on Saturday, March 2, when a religious service was conducted by the Rev. Gordon Cooper. The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (President) welcomed the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent, who gave an address in which he dealt with the opportunities for service opened up by the guilds. Guilds, he said, existed for promoting kindly sympathy with young life, for education, recreation, and social intercourse, but more especially for religion. Young people usually decided between the ages of 16 and 25 years what kind of life they were going to live, and the Guild not only helped them to make that decision, but gave them encouragement in carrying it out. How great would be the effect if the 10,000 scholars in their Sunday schools over 16 years of age entered with heart and soul and mind into church work. There were many branches such as Sunday-school teaching, temperance work, sick visiting, social service, and the establishment of reading circles, which gave ample opportunities for the exercise of various tastes and abilities. Several questions were asked at the conclusion of the address.

London: Kentish Town.—On Sunday evening, March 10, an address will be given at the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town, by Mr. Thomas Holmes, Secretary of the Howard Association, formerly police court missionary in the North London district, and the writer of "The London Police Courts." Mr. Holmes will speak on "Prisons and Prisoners."

London Lay Preachers' Union.—The usual monthly meeting was held at Essex Hall on February 26. The reading circle continued its study of Dr. Beard's "Hibbert Lectures," and subsequently a service was conducted and a sermon preached by Miss E. Fitzsimmons, of Highgate. Schemes upon the text chosen for the sermon were afterwards submitted by several members present.

London: Unity Church, Islington.—We understand that the jubilee of the opening of Unity Church in 1862, upon the removal of the congregation from Carter-lane to Islington, will be celebrated during the autumn.

Maldstone.—The Rev. Alex. Farquharson has been giving a series of Sunday evening discourses on "Phases of the Religious Life." Last Sunday the chapel was again crowded, and chairs had to be placed in the aisles. On Tuesday the annual Sunday-school party was held in the Concert Hall. Over 400 attended. After tea Mr. Farquharson presented prizes and medals, and reported improvement all round in the school. Mr. Fred Ruck is still continuing his devoted work as superintendent. The congregation is very desirous of being able to start the building of the new church during the present year.

Mansfield.—The Rev. F. H. Vaughan delivered the third, and last, of the present series of half-hour talks at the Mansfield Free Library on February 26, his subject being "Dickens and Tolstoy." The lecturer drew some interesting parallels between the life and work of the two writers, dwelling on the large comradeship and fraternal sympathy which lived in the heart of each. Mr. I. H. Wallis, in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Vaughan, asked him if he would prepare a list of Tolstoy's works which they ought to have in the library, and added that if it were necessary to duplicate Dickens' books no doubt the committee would do so. The Rev. F. H. Vaughan, in reply, suggested that as a memento of the centenary of Dickens a portrait of him should be placed on the Library walls. On February 20 the annual prize distribution to Sunday school scholars took place at the Old Meeting House, the Rev. F. H. Vaughan presiding. An excellent report was given of the work and progress of the school.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: The Late Mrs. James Southern.—By the death of Mrs. Isabella Southern, which occurred somewhat suddenly on Wednesday, February 28, the Church of the Divine Unity has lost a life-long worshipper. Mrs. Southern was the daughter of the late Ald. T. P. Barkas, whose influence was widely felt in the North. Throughout her life Mrs. Southern was especially interested in the church, and among the poems in a volume of "Sonnets and other Poems," which she had published, was one dedicated to it. She took a deep interest in the religions of the East, and had a very intimate knowledge of the Vedas. She did not allow her intellectual pursuits to narrow her sympathies, and took some years ago an active interest in the work of the Byker Mission. Mrs. Southern leaves a daughter, who is living in India, and a son, settled in New Zealand.

Rotherham.—On Friday, March 1, a meeting was held in the school-room of the Church of Our Father to bid farewell to Dr. Mellor, who is going to Warrington to take charge of Cairo-street Chapel. Mr. T. Cocker presided, and Mr. A. Pearson, on behalf of the congregation, made a presentation of a gold watch and a purse of gold to Dr. Mellor, expressing the general regret that was felt at his approaching departure. He specially referred to the interest which he had taken in the Sunday school, and the Sunday afternoon class, which had greatly increased its members during his ministry. Dr. Mellor, in replying, said that the gifts which had been presented to him were a culmination of the multitudinous kindnesses which he had received. His experience in Rotherham had encouraged him to go on and complete the work which he took in hand when he first went there.

Sheffield.—The special courses of Sunday evening addresses which are being given at the three local churches are being greatly appreciated, and good congregations have regularly assembled to hear the Rev. C. J. Street on

"Fights for Free Faith," the Rev. A. H. Dolphin on "Evolution, Life and Religion" at Upperthorpe, and the Rev. J. W. Cock on "Positive Aspects of our Faith" at Attercliffe. At Upper-street Chapel last Sunday between four and five hundred listened to an address on "The Quaker's Inner Light."

Sheffield District.—The new Free Christian Church at Mexborough, formed by a large group of the members of the Congregational Church in that town who seceded in consequence of the recent resignation of the Rev. Thos. Anderson, has made an excellent start, large congregations having assembled on the last two Sunday evenings in the hall which has been hired for their services. A Sunday school was formed last Sunday with over eighty scholars in attendance. Sunday morning services are to be begun forthwith. Mr. Anderson has accepted an earnest invitation to become the minister, and will continue his charge of the Free Congregational Church at Bolton-on-Dearne, which he founded a year ago. Both these churches have allied themselves with the new Sheffield District Association of Unitarian, Free Christian, and Free Congregational Churches, and their members are delighted at the warm welcome they have received. The Doncaster Free Christian Church, whose delegates took part in the framing of a constitution of the new Association, and which, at a church meeting, unanimously resolved to join the Association, when its provisional title was of "Free Christian, Free Congregational, and Unitarian Churches," has withdrawn from it as the majority of the constituent churches insisted on the name "Unitarian" coming first in the title, and has resolved to stand quite independent of all organisations for the next two years.

Woolwich.—The Rev. T. F. M. Brockway has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the ministry of Carmel Chapel.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE REVISED VERSION.

In the course of a recent interview, the Archbishop of Canterbury mentioned the interesting fact that the number of churches using the Revised Version was steadily increasing, and a good many users now found their objections less grave than before. Dr. Gow, the Head Master of Westminster School, also pointed out that the Oxford and Cambridge Board had recently decided that all Bible quotations in its examination papers must be from the Revised Version. The Authorised Version was thus practically banished from the schools.

WOMEN'S EDUCATION IN INDIA.

An appeal for funds has been made through the press on behalf of the Indian Women's Education Association. "For some time past it has been felt," the writers say, "that the supply of Indian teachers for the education of girls in India was most inadequate, and that the teachers were inefficient. To remedy these defects a scheme has been originated in Calcutta by the Mahila Samiti, an association of Indian women, to raise a fund for training and educating Indian girls in England with a view to enable them, on their return to India, to introduce improved methods of teaching in that country. This training must be gone through in England, as at present there are no facilities for carrying it on in India. Later on it is hoped to start a training college for women in India." The funds raised so far amount to £118 collected in England, and £80 collected by Indian sympathisers, with which an Indian girl has been brought to England and has begun her training. The Association is appealing, however, for financial support in order that it may further other objects which it has in view for improving the education of women in India. It is hoped that it will be able to endow a permanent scholarship of £200 a year later on.

THE READING PUBLIC IN AUSTRALIA.

According to a writer in the Book Monthly, it is easier to get a classic of English literature in the "back blocks" of Australia than in many a rural district of England, while almost every township has its free library, mechanics' institute, or book exchange of some sort. "A mining camp scarcely emerges from its canvas coverings before it is demanding books, and a place for its town hall and free library, or mechanics' institute, is marked on the plan of the new town as soon as it has one. The enterprise of Australia is considerable. Nowhere are reading facilities more abundant and valuable." The capital of each State has its public library. To these libraries the State Parliaments make annual grants, and the trustees, who are representative of the best brains and culture in the State, are appointed by the Government, and in some cases hold office for life.

* * *

Naturally, the further removed from literary centres an Australian is, the more eager is he to get books; but seldom is a hut in the bush, or in the most desolate part of the back country—where a man may be a day's ride from his nearest neighbour, and three or four hundred miles from the nearest township—without its store of books and means of exchanging them. "The trustees of the main State libraries are always ready to help country libraries by sending them cases of books on loan, and even to start libraries by such loans. The travelling library is said to have originated in Australia, the trustees of the Melbourne Public Library being the authors of it. Cases of books are sent to remote country townships that cannot provide themselves with libraries. Each case contains 300 books, and the cases are changed or refilled at the end of the year, so that books that have spent one summer in the grey sun-blistered Mallee may find themselves the next in a wildwood settlement of Croajingolong."

A MINISTRY OF FINE ARTS.

"Is it not surprising," asks Miss Gertrude Kingston, in the course of an article entitled "Wanted: A Ministry of Fine Arts," in the Nineteenth Century, "that so vast, so all-embracing a subject as the Arts should have no minister, no trained staff of its own? . . . I question whether the beautiful buildings that I see being destroyed daily in London—the latest to go are the houses in Lincoln's Inn Fields built by Inigo Jones himself—would not have been preserved and repaired in a suitable manner had there been a Ministry of Fine Arts. At present, if they are conserved at all, it is only individual generosity that has to be thanked! It appears to be no part of the programme of the First Commissioner of Work and Public Buildings to take a walk between Piccadilly Circus and Oxford-street, let us say, and note the fine survivals of old London that are marked for destruction."

In regard to the theatre, Miss Kingston thinks there is no hope for free thought or for good art, until we have a public office prepared and authorised to deal with the Arts themselves. "Let the theatre have a department of its own, a conscientiously conceived and well-administered office in the Ministry of Fine Arts. Here we should find, I do not doubt, under some enlightened chief—chosen on account of his knowledge of artistic qualifications—a trained staff fully adequate to deal with any questions that may arise in the theatre. All matters concerning theatres, music halls, exhibitions, and places of entertainment generally, should be taken over and be under the control of a 'Public Amusements' department in the new ministerial centre."

THE FINAL TRIUMPH OF JUSTICE.

Mr. G. W. E. Russell in his article on Henry Labouchere in the Cornhill Magazine, quotes some effective words of Mr. Gladstone's which will bear repeating at the present time. They formed the peroration to the speech introducing the Irish Land Bill of 1881. "As it has been said that Love is stronger than Death, even so Justice is stronger than popular excitement, stronger than the passions of the moment, stronger even than the grudges, the resentments, and the sad traditions of the past. Walking in that light we cannot err. Guided by that light—that Divine light—we are safe. Every step that we take upon our road is a step that brings us nearer to the goal, and every obstacle, even although for the moment it may seem insurmountable, can only for a little while retard, and never can defeat, the final triumph."

THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS ON THE RIVIERA.

The P.C.A. is doing good work in the South of France, but few animal-lovers in England, says the Animals' Guardian, can realise the disheartening nature of the campaign which is being waged against cruelty by such a society as the one in Nice. The P.C.A. of Nice possesses a very useful kiosk in the beautiful public gardens facing the Place Massena. There, for several hours daily, M. Bernard Louis, the obliging Inspector-General of the society, is on duty to receive information from the public concerning unfortunate animals, or to place his services at the disposal of all who have the interests of his society at heart. During the last few weeks the resources of the society have been taxed to the uttermost. A decree issued by the Prefect of the Alpes Maritimes, ordering that every dog must be muzzled and provided with a chain when out with its owner, has resulted in hundreds of dogs being thrown on the streets. French and Italian dog-owners are sometimes of so economical a turn of mind that, rather than go to the expense of buying muzzles and chains, they will abandon their animals.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is impossible not to refer to the Coal Strike though the prospects of peace are still shrouded in the secrecy of private negotiations. The miners having shown their determination have consented to negotiate, and the country is basing its hopes of a speedy settlement upon this more conciliatory attitude, though the Welsh and Scotch owners have abated none of their hostility to the minimum wage. The tranquillity and good order of the community under the strain have been remarkable, in spite of some disquieting symptoms of rising temper. Meanwhile, a formidable coal strike has begun in Germany and is threatened in the United States, a warning that the present labour unrest has a deeper and more pervading cause than the special hardships of local conditions.

* * *

THE Bishop of Durham, who disclaims any sympathy with collective Socialism as a way to general happiness, but acknowledges a large measure of justice in the miners' demands, has made a strong appeal to the well-to-do not to injure the community by a selfish regard for their own comfort or pleasure during this time of stress. "I address myself," he writes, "to all who care for neighbour and country. I appeal for the keeping of a wholesome Lent (in no merely ecclesiastical sense), a Lent of plain living, in order to unselfish, public-spirited thinking, and to that wise but willing giving (not of money only) which plain living facilitates. I appeal for a watchful handling of our means and our habits, as by those who know that we all, persons and classes, are members of one another, and therefore inexorably responsible to one another, able to help or hurt one another indefinitely as we remember this or forget it."

MR. BIRRELL made a vigorous speech in favour of Disestablishment on Thursday at a joint gathering of the Protestant Dissenting Deputies and the Liberation Society. He spoke, he said, as one who valued the proud tradition of Nonconformity, for he was above everything else a historic Nonconformist. He met the plea that we needed an established church because we were a Christian nation by the statement, that if it were so it could only be, having regard to our innumerable differences of religious opinion, that after all there was such a thing as common Christianity. But the dominant party in the Church of England would have nothing to do with this suggestion and rejected it as a delusion and a snare. He held himself that it was no longer possible to defend church establishment on the ground that the Church of England was the one true church or because of its comprehensiveness. Between the Catholic and the Protestant parties there was a gulf fixed which could not be bridged. His objection to establishment was one of principle and not of majorities.

THE address which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald gave in Manchester last Sunday on "The Church and Labour Unrest" had in it rather more heat than light. He placed his finger, it is true, on some sore spots in our spiritual economy when he referred to the dependence of the churches upon wealthy people and complained of a want of down-rightness in the attack of the pulpit upon the sins of the rich. But he allowed himself simply to play to the gallery when he asked the rhetorical question, "If a man were in grief or doubt, if he wanted to know what was right or wrong in a situation, would he think of going to a bishop to instruct or enlighten him? He would not," Mr.

Macdonald must know quite well how easily an anti-clerical appeal of that kind goes down with the sort of audience which he was addressing. There are, unfortunately, worldlings in all the churches, and there are saints among dignitaries and bishops. Men like the late Bishop King, of Lincoln, may be quite mediæval in their personal opinions about property and stand outside the storm-centres of the social movement, and yet possess an invincible attraction for us in the moral crises of life, and minister spiritual healing to the soul of which few men know the secret.

It is nearly twelve years since the Royal Commission on Vivisection was appointed, and, after the leisurely manner of Government inquiries, it has only just presented its report. After examining a large number of witnesses eminent in physiological, pathological, and sanitary science, the Commissioners state that there can be no doubt that the great preponderance of medical and scientific authority is against the opponents of vivisection. This, in their opinion, is more markedly so now than was the case before the Royal Commission of 1875. On the moral question they express themselves as follows:—"After full consideration we are led to the conclusion that experiments upon animals, adequately safeguarded by law, faithfully administered, are morally justifiable and should not be prohibited by legislation."

THE general recommendations to which public attention will naturally be directed are not of a very important character and will not require special legislation. They are in the direction of an increase in the inspectorate, and additional restrictions regulating the painless destruction of animals which show signs of suffering after experiment. On the latter point there is a Minority Report signed by Colonel Lockwood, Sir William Collins and Dr. Wilson, who go a good deal further than their colleagues felt themselves able to do. The Minority also think that additional legislation is necessary in order to secure the undivided responsibility of the Secretary of State, aided by skilled advisers, and exercising control and supervision by an adequate staff of inspectors. In regard to further protection for domestic animals, most of the Commissioners agree that, in the event of any alteration in the existing procedure, the special enactments now applicable to horses, asses and mules might be extended to dogs, and also to cats and to anthropoid apes.

ON the whole the report should bring some measure of relief to the public mind. It is marked by a grave sense of responsibility and is the work of humane men. The recommendations also are all in the direction of restriction. The scientific evidence will be subjected to keen scrutiny, but there seems to be little reason to suppose that the conclusion is likely to be shaken that experiments have helped to prevent or alleviate great human or animal suffering. With that many people will be content, but there are others whose attitude is not based upon a calculation of benefits, but upon respect for the sanctity of animal life and a strong repugnance to the infliction of pain. For them the issue of the Report will simply mark a stage in a long struggle, and a fresh presentation of the scientific evidence will in no way affect the protest of conscience.

THE deputation to the Archbishop of Canterbury on New Testament Revision, to which we referred last week, has no intention of allowing the matter to rest. In the Daily News the Dean of Norwich returns to the attack on the literary quality of the Revised Version. He acknowledges that the revisers of 1880 were Greek scholars of the first magnitude, but just as certainly they were not English scholars. The memorial presented to the Archbishop, he points out, was signed by almost every professor of English literature and almost every headmaster of the great public schools. He ventures to sum up their feeling in the judgment passed by Matthew Arnold when the Revised Version of the New Testament first appeared:—

“If by an act of authority the new version could be made to supersede the old, and the old to go out of use, a blow would be struck at religion in this country far more dangerous than the hindrances with which it has to contend now. The new enemy would be indifference, an ever-growing indifference to a New Testament which failed to delight and move men like the old, and to fix its phrases in the memory.”

IMPERFECT SYMPATHIES.

AT the present juncture we should like to recommend our readers to make acquaintance with “Seems So!” the striking volume which Mr. STEPHEN REYNOLDS has written in collaboration with his fisherman friends BOB and TOM WOOLLEY.* It is called a working class view of politics, but it is something much more than that. It is an illuminating study of the mind of the poor and its method of approaching the chief problems of life, which is likely to upset many complacent theories and to make us conscious of the extent to which we are the victims of imperfect sympathies. The difficulty which lies in the way of most reformers and frustrates many of their efforts is ignorance of the material with which they have to deal, and the steady refusal of the legatees of their bounty to accept the most cleverly devised schemes for their welfare, which neither meet their need nor satisfy their desire. We are all the victims of our class-consciousness, and we are tempted to apply the standards and judgments which are natural to a man entrenched behind a secure bank-balance to the habits and sentiments of the poor. We often do this not through any lack of goodwill, but chiefly from invincible ignorance of any other type of life but our own. A new method of approach through the mind of the other man is what we need chiefly, and whatever reveals that mind to us at work amid all the varied conditions of its own life, thinking what it actually does think and not what we believe it ought to think, has a value at the present time far beyond that of abstract theories of justice or ideal schemes of brotherhood.

It is the signal merit of “Seems So!” that it does this in a convincing and disquieting way. The middle-class man will receive a severe shock to his complacent confidence that his own scheme of life is the best for all men. Mr. REYNOLDS is very emphatic in his condemnation of the folly of trying to force upon one class the standards and ideals of another. He goes further, and insists that some of the things which have been done with a most genuine desire to improve the lot of the poor are met with resentment because they violate some of their deepest instincts. For instance, a great deal of modern social legislation involves an elaborate system of inspection. The poor man regards this as a violation of the privacy of his home. The inspector stands for a type of interference with his domestic affairs which rouses him to anger, and he knows quite well that the rich man’s house is not liable to this form of legal intrusion by “the bogey-man” at every hour of the day. “After several years of life in a working-man’s home as one of the family—not from necessity exactly, nor yet as an investigator, but from choice—I confess frankly,” so Mr. REYNOLDS writes, “that I should certainly hoodwink an inspector, not simply for the sheer joy of baulking him, but as revenge for his intrusion into our home.”

Mr. REYNOLDS has also a good deal to say about the false judgments which are passed upon the poor through a failure to recognise the subtle differences in moral standards and the varying intensity of hatred or admiration as we move from one class to another. He quotes with approval the following words by Miss LOANE: “They range the list of human virtues in a different order from that commonly adopted by the more educated classes. Generosity ranks before justice, sympathy before truth, love before chastity, a pliant and obliging disposition before a rigidly honest one. In brief, the less admixture of intellect required for the practice of any virtue, the higher it stands in popular estimation.” If this is true, and it will hardly be called in question by men who can speak from experience, we have another instance of the danger of trying to exert moral influence or raise the tone of life into conformity with what we ourselves deem best on a basis of imperfect sympathies.

We must find room for one more quotation, for it deals with the economic problem which is so acute at the present moment:—

“The question of wages and earnings, though capable, in books, of economic treatment, is not in life a purely economic matter. It is nothing so simple. No doubt the reason of the grievance is a stark inequality of reward for different kinds of work, but the driving force behind the grievance is social and personal—a matter of feeling and class-friction. The labourer’s self is even more hurt than his pocket. He sees that the brain-worker is paid on a different scale altogether; that the professional man, though he calls himself poor, lives pretty well; that the negotiator is still more highly paid; that the organiser exacts a heavy toll for arranging other people’s labour; that the manipulator of money and of the necessities of life stands to make a huge fortune; while he himself is lucky if he merely lives with few of the comforts and pleasures which the brain-worker takes as of right, and with nothing to look forward to after all his work except a still poorer old age. He sees all that plainly enough, but it is the calm assumption of superior worth on the part of the ‘likes o’ they,’ or the more offensive holding of their own on the part of half-bred people, which drives it home.”

This passage is not an argument; it is a statement of plain unvarnished fact, which will not cease to exist if we resolve to close our eyes to it. But that is the last thing which any sensible man will wish to do. He will resolve to try to understand the meaning of it, and to place himself in the shoes of the man who murmurs in the bitterness of his soul, "You works an' slaves an' worries, an' never gets no for'arder. You do get five bob a week to die on, come you'm seventy, if you ever are." We imagine that few of our readers will quarrel with Mr. REYNOLDS' plea, that ultimately "work is a giving of life one way or another, in return for the means of more life than could otherwise be obtained—in return, that is to say, not only for the means of living, but for the means of living more fully." But we shall have to escape from a whole network of imperfect sympathies if we are to realise the full significance of these words, and to see in the masses of men who are defeated in hope and never get "no for'arder" the spiritual bankruptcy of civilisation itself.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

EVOLUTION AND RELIGION.

THERE are, and probably always will be, numbers of seriously minded people who gladly welcome any support which Science seems to give for their religious conviction that the cosmos is ordered by a personal will and purpose, and cannot avoid regret, when such support is denied; so long as that is the case there will always be room for discussions on the subject of this article. The article itself is prompted by the reading of a new edition of the late Samuel Butler's "Evolution, Old and New,"* and by consequent reflections on some still unsettled controversies in the realm of Science. The re-issue of Butler's book wakens an echo of a controversy of thirty odd years ago which did not at the time seem to be of great importance, but which, in more recent years, has assumed a position of considerable prominence, and the issue of which can hardly fail to affect seriously at least one form of the religious consciousness. Samuel Butler, as we have said in these columns before, a writer of remarkable power and insight, found himself driven into opposition to the current Darwinian view of Evolution, and his opposition centred especially round one point. In the general theory of the evolutionary process, the fact of variation played an important part. How was such variation brought about? Darwin replied that variation is due to the power of "natural selection" (a phrase, by the way, which is now treated with far too much familiarity and far too little respect). Now, whatever may have been the case with Darwin himself, there is no doubt that, in the merits of his immediate followers, this view of the matter gave an almost completely preponderating place and value to environmental forces in the development of life; it is Nature, in the form of surrounding conditions and circumstances, who is responsible for every change in the organism. Nature selects, and perhaps induces, variations in the individual which help it to survive: the whole impulse is external; Nature, environment, gives the push, and the organism responds as best it can. If it is lucky, and if selection is kind, then survival is the reward: otherwise, extinction is the inevitable doom. This relatively simple hypothesis undoubtedly covered a multitude of facts and was an excellent basis for valuable observation and experiment; but it led with certainty to a wholly mechanical view of the world, and produced those visions of the "gladiatorial show" which Huxley made familiar; all mysteries were to be solved in terms of cause and effect and with physico-chemical formulæ. All notion of purpose in nature went by the board, and the hypothesis of evolution seemed utterly opposed to the convictions of religion. "I maintain," wrote Professor Haeckel in 1876, "with regard to the much talked-of 'purpose in Nature' that it has no existence but for those persons who observe phenomena in plants and animals in the most superficial manner"; and the neo-Darwinians generally agreed with Haeckel. Butler and some few others refused submission; they knew of another view of the evolutionary process in which the emphasis was placed in an entirely different direction. This was the Lamarckian view, according to which variations were due not only to modifications produced by the environment but also to modifications teleologically conditioned from within the organism itself, expressing ideals of well-being not borrowed from the environment and a will to survive independent, in some sense, of merely natural compulsion or permission. The organism had, as it were, a life purpose of its own which it could and did assert even against natural environment, and this self-assertion of the organism was a factor in the problem of variation not to be neglected. Butler, indeed, made it the supreme factor, and was uncompromising in his adherence to the Lamarckian support of a teleological explanation. Butler's teleological view developed into an interesting and intricate, perhaps in some respects a fantastic, hypothesis of continuity of memory and individuality as the important thing in Evolution. The whole process became, for Butler, simply the increasing effort of a single Individual to realise itself, all its endeavour being inwardly conditioned by a conceived notion of the end to be reached, and carried forward continually by the power of an undying memory. Into the subtleties of that enthralling theory we need not here enter. All that we wish to make clear is that, within the realm of Science itself, there were from the first two sharply contrasted views of the nature of the evolutionary process: there was, on the one hand, the mechanical view with its category of natural selection and its insistence on environmental forces; and on the other hand the teleological or vitalistic view, possibly without any definite category, but with a steadfast insistence on the primary place and value of organismal, as opposed to environmental, forces. For one side the key word was "cause and effect"; for the other, it was "purpose."

This difference of opinion, when Butler first expounded his theories to the world, passed almost unnoticed; the mechanical view of the process of Evolution held unchallenged sway, its fundamentally pessimistic character being relieved only by a vague, and on the whole quite unjustifiable, suggestion, tacitly made in evolutionary writings and discussions, that the process was towards a goal that would be worth while. But, as scientific thought advanced, the almost forgotten controversy assumed new prominence and importance, and teleological or vitalistic views of the evolutionary process began to be put forward with a confidence quite shocking to the earlier Darwinians. More full and adequate investigation of the problem of hereditary transmission of effective modifications produced something of a reaction in favour of Lamarckian views; and although, from the side of physico-chemical theory, the arguments in support of a vitalistic hypothesis are treated still with contempt and consigned indiscriminately to the realm of mysticism, there is undoubtedly at the present moment a strong tendency amongst men of science to allow a far greater value than ever before to the place of the organism itself as a factor in evolution, and to take, almost as the fundamental fact in the whole business, the individual creature viewed as a powerful, creative agent, "a striving will, a changeful Proteus, selecting its environment, adapting itself to it, self-differentiating and self-adaptive," guided all along by an inwardly conceived purpose, by an interior impulse towards fuller realisation. The important thing in evolution is not the power of natural selection, but the will of the individual to realise itself, the "wille zur Macht" of Nietzsche, "l'élan vitale" of Bergson, a conceived purpose, as it were, turned to instinct, and conditioning the whole movement of finitude; we get the conception of Evolution as a process in which the dominating factor is Life itself, a non-mechanical energy of will and purpose, master of its destiny.

What the verdict of Science in regard to this whole matter will be ultimately we do not know: as Professor Driesch says, "We do not know very much about evolution at all, because in this field we are only just at the beginning of what deserves the name of exact Knowledge." But the cleavage in opinion is obviously of great interest, and possibly of great importance, to religion, or at least to some cherished convictions of religion. Let us put the alternative. Supposing, on the one hand, that Science becomes wedded to the mechanical view of evolution, then, obviously, some convictions of religion stand but a poor chance of scientific support. Thus, on a strictly mechanical view of evolution, the ancient and popular arguments from design become useless or unintelligible in the ordinarily accepted sense. The world will yield no evidence of purpose or of will anywhere, whilst the attempted substitute of the "one, far off divine event" will appear as a pathetic illusion. Huxley and Clifford and many another scientist have thus viewed and presented Nature as entirely purposeless and void of meaning: for these men, religion, and even morality, have been but inexplicable products of the general process, receiving for their hopes and ideals absolutely no support from the course and destiny of the world. Bertrand Russell, in an amazingly brilliant essay on "The Free Man's Worship," has put the situation with clearness and eloquence, presenting man as a creature of hope and aspiration, in the midst of "an alien and inhuman world," without support in the visible universe, and dependent solely upon inward faith for the preservation of his ideals. If Evolution is merely a mechanical process, then Religion must indubitably beat a retreat from the realm of Science, and resign herself exclusively to the life of faith, expecting no support beyond what she can find in the inward nature of man, and constantly taking the risk that even the verdict of man's inner nature may rest upon accident and illusion. There are those (and the present writer is amongst the number) for whom this centralising of Religion upon the simple life and witness of faith, inwardly aroused, conditioned, and sustained, is neither alarming nor undesirable, who would indeed welcome such a recrudescence of mystical faith; but there are others who would feel Religion wholly slipping from them if it found no support elsewhere, and their case is hard if the mechanical view of Evolution prevails.

On the other hand, should the teleological or vitalistic hypothesis gain an ascendancy, then those who crave scientific support for their religious convictions would have cause to rejoice. Introduce purpose, really consciously conceived purpose, into the course of evolution, as vitalistic theories do, and at least one great conviction of religion, that, namely, which views the universe as the expression of a Divine Will, comes near some sort of verification; at any rate, such a conviction could no longer be decried as opposed to science, but might actually aid science in the unravelling of deeper mysteries. If Science concludes that the predominant factor in the course of world history is the will, or the conscious desire of the organism for fuller self-realisation, then both philosophy and religion will find it possible to give much additional weight to their general arguments in favour of a divinely purposive origin and meaning of the universe as a whole.

These, we admit, are obvious generalisations, but not, we hope, unimportant; and, meanwhile, the mere fact that, in the realm of science itself, teleological and vitalistic views have a place, and moreover a place no longer uncertain and indefinite, should not be overlooked by those interested in religion. That mystical synthesis of the whole of life, which is really Religion, though, as we believe, possessed in itself of all the substantiation and verification necessary to it, yet cannot be indifferent quite either to the hostility or to the friendliness of Science; and when the hand of friendship seems offered by Science, it would be not only ungenerous, but infinitely foolish, on the part of Religion not gladly to accept it.

LIFE IN AN AMERICAN VILLAGE.

THERE has come into our hands recently the personal diary from 1852 onwards of a schoolgirl living with her grandparents in the select and exclusive atmosphere of a small country town in New York State.* Its special interest lies in the genuine and homely portraiture it gives of a little group of human souls teaching and learning and winning life together in a scene of antiquated peace under the shadow of an awesome faith. The writer, Caroline Richards, is the aunt of the late "John Oliver Hobbes." In early childhood she and her sister Anna, her junior by three years, having lost their mother, were adopted by the latter's parents, who had already known the care of eleven children of their own. The light of day found an unvarying temper in the conservative routine of the country banker's quiet home, where the green flag-bottomed chairs and everything else in the house was forty years old, and yet as good as new; where, instead of gas, "we have the funniest little sperm oil lamp with a shade on to read by evenings, and the fire on the hearth gives grandfather and grandmother all the light they want, for she knits in her corner and we read aloud to them if they want us to." The author began her diary on her tenth birthday, and takes us straightway into her confidence. Despite the fact that before going to school in the morning she has to read three chapters of the Bible every day, and five on Sundays, which takes her through the Bible in a year, she cannot see how people "happened to be so awfully good" as the "Dairyman's Daughter," given her as an example, and finds it hard not to laugh and talk or "think any thoughts" on Sundays, for such, she is told, is the proper preparation for the Eternal Sabbath. In the Children's Sermon, the minister describes how many steps it takes to be bad, as wilful childhood descends the slopes of the pit from the first slippery lie to drunkenness at the bottom. When a schoolfellow's gold chain excited a longing in the diarist to possess the like, the grandfather's argument that a meek and quiet spirit was better than outward adornment, was met by the written comment, "I know it is very becoming to grandmother, and she wears it all the time, but I wish I had a gold chain just the same." To this strict but lovable little woman Christianity involved severance from every kind of artificial pleasure. She had not danced since she made profession of her faith 50 years before, and was of one mind with her honoured partner, that "cards were outrageous, or contagious, or something dreadful." Even the father's gift to his children of "Gulliver's Travels" did not escape the brand of the censor, for the gilt figure on the covers of the giant astride of the Lilliputs so annoyed her that she pasted a piece of pink calico over his legs, up to the waist.

But of the four inmates of that quaint and charming household little Anna, the younger sister, is the most winsome. She is always an incalculable quantity, and, therefore, a special disciplinary vigilance seems to have been extended over her. The literature selected for her tender years included Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," and, as a Christmas present, "The Child's Book on Repentance." But "Anna tied her shoe-strings in hard knots so she could sit up later." She "practised her lesson over sixty-five times this morning before breakfast, and can play 'Mary to the Saviour's tomb' as fast as a waltz." To grandmother's surprise, Anna's interpretation of the appointment of a day of public fasting was "to eat as fast as you can." When the grandfather remarked at night that we are all making history each day, Anna replied that she should "Try not to have hers as dry as some that she had to learn at school today." The grandmother knew the Bible from Genesis to Revelation, "excepting the 'begats' and the hard names." But Anna discovered a verse that proved her downfall: "At Parbar westward, four at the causeway and two at Parbar." The old lady put her spectacles up on her forehead, and looking earnestly in her critic's face protested that she thought it was not in the Bible. Probably some other students of the Scriptures would fail to put their finger on this passage at a moment's notice.

We have spoken of the restraints and prohibitions practised in this godly home, where early hours were observed and tea drinking not allowed before the eighteenth year; yet it cannot be denied that these regulations played their part in building up sound and graceful characters, and even in winning for the aged heads of the household the unbounded reverence and love of their grandchildren. Here, at any rate, in this little nest, were four charming happy souls animated by so much healthy vitality and affection that less momentous defects in the educational system and theology were powerless to warp or cripple their natures. "Grandmother was born a Christian about eighty years ago," Anna declared to the intrusive revivalist in defence of her guardian's religion. "I never could be as good as she if I tried a hundred years," said her sister. The later years of the diary saw America devastated by war. What this and the assassination of Lincoln meant in a small northern community is told in a few unaffected but vivid pages.

METHODS OF VIOLENCE.

SIR,—With you I sincerely regret the window-breaking outrages of the militant suffragists. But without discussing the general question of women's suffrage, may I say that condemnation would have come with better grace had you first earned the right to offer it by having been bolder in your advocacy of the justice of their claim?

You have waited until now before censuring the violence which has marked this great modern movement. But you seem to forget that the violence has not been all on one side. Why, then, were you so silent when the campaign was precisely a campaign of "sufferings and martyrdoms which are inflicted by others"? I presume you have carefully and impartially studied the origin and development of "militancy" before criticising the present phase of it. If so you must know perfectly well that it began not by the women inflicting violence on anyone but by their passively suffering violence to be done to them by others. Did you complain ever so gently when these women were brutally assaulted and flung down steps of public halls and frog marched along the corridors for putting questions which experience had taught them were not answered at the close of the meeting? Did you make any protest when these women on "Black Friday" were savagely and indecently handled by certain of the police and the mob of hooligans who aided them? Did you study the detailed report on these outrages issued at the time, and did you then quote extracts from it and appeal to the spirit and example of Christ? Violence against property you condemn, but where were you and others when the violence was against person and by the police and the ruffians who acted with them? You speak of what distinguishes martyrdom. Let me recall a remark of Martineau's, "If being orthodox you die at the stake you are a martyr; if being heretic—why, then you are a man burnt."

But supposing that you have good and sufficient reason for having been silent then, when it was dangerous to speak, and for being outspoken now, when it is hardly safe to be silent, yet there is something more I should like to say.

I welcome gratefully your statement that you do not impugn the motives of these women or question their perfect sincerity. But I think justice, not to say magnanimity, might have permitted you to be more generous. After all there are worse things than violence, and it is possible to over-do our protest against it. I gather from the pages of the New Testament that our Lord was frequently violent in speech, as when he denounced woe upon the scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites. His language was occasionally treasonable, as when he referred to constituted authority as "that fox." Once at least he was actually guilty of physical assault upon persons when he whipped the money-changers out of the Temple; and finally he was executed as a felon on the Roman gallows. I further observe that our Faith, so "lawlessly" begun, did not make its way except through scenes of turbulence and blood. It was not merely that Christians passively submitted to be hauled before judges and dragged to the arena and the stake. They deliberately, actively, and of set purpose broke the law. They met in unlawful assemblies. They combined in felonious conspiracy to circumvent and defeat the Government. They escaped from prisons. They resisted unto blood. Paul was peculiarly notorious as a storm centre. He was perpetually in disgrace and conflict with magistrates and police. There is no proof I think that he was actively violent, but he acted with such deliberate lawlessness that the natural outcome of his conduct was bloodshed and criminal proceedings. He even glories that he was "in prisons more abundantly, in stripes above measure, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times I received forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods and once was I stoned... In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king guarded the city in order to take me, and through a window was I let down in a basket by the wall and escaped his hands." Truly "He that is led of the Spirit is not under the law." Of course, we explain these things away. Besides, they happened a long time ago. But what did the scholars and patricians think of the Faith and of an apostle that got themselves into such undignified and ungentelemanly scrapes? They probably sneered "Religion!" with a fine curl of the lip and a scornful shrug of the shoulder.

I am not suggesting parallels or justifications, but only offering mitigating memories that shall make us less hysterical in our violence against violence. The truth is that good causes never come to bring peace but a sword, to rend families asunder and set a man at variance against his father and the daughter against her mother. No great movement has ever made headway without some "regrettable incidents." We may rightly deplore them and condemn them, but let us also try to understand them. If we wish to be fair, if we wish to be merciful, we shall never forget what is the inspiration on the one hand and the provocation on the other. If we mean to measure causes and effects we shall see that what is really most responsible for violence is never the new revolution but the old complacent tyranny. There may be no exact parallel between any one event in history and another, but there is usually some affinity whereby we may classify them. The women have not yet (spite of the recent inflammatory taunt of an anti-suffragist Cabinet Minister) burnt down castles and palaces as the men did in Bristol and Nottingham. They have not torn up Hyde Park railings. They have not used the dagger or the bomb like the Irishmen. They have not caused the Riot Act to be read or been shot down in Featherstone, Peterloo or Trafalgar Square. They do not sit at their desks with a loaded revolver at their side, as did Theodore Parker as he wrote his sermon and defied the Fugitive Slave Laws. They have the White Slave traffic and other hideous evils to fight against; but in comparison with men they have shown extraordinary restraint and dignity and self-control. Ought you not to have remembered this and stated it to their credit? Could you not have said, in view of the steady evolution of militancy and of the gradual intensification of reprisals against increasingly cruel repressions, that these outrages which you and I condemn are the outcome of an exasperated womanhood goaded to desperation by the callous tyranny of our sex? In the presence of a cold-blooded and impassive male autocracy, these women decided upon insurrection in order to convince us that they will not be governed except democratically by their own consent. They were wrong and mistaken. Yes, but the electorate and the Government are still more gravely and wickedly wrong and mistaken. Can we not spare some of our criticism and indignation for those who deserve it most?

Many of these women are to my own personal knowledge ladies of high intellectual moral and religious gifts. I have many friends among them whom it is an honour and a privilege to know. They are persons of profound piety and consecrated selflessness. Their fault would almost seem to be that they are too high-principled to be swayed by our worldly-wise and often cynical pleas for delay and compromise. They react against an obdurate opposition as mettlesome minorities have ever reacted against despotism. They defy the laws which they have had no hand in making, and endure without complaint the vindictive and savage penalties of a panic-stricken magistracy. Some of them have actually died in direct consequence of their sufferings—literally slain by what they experienced on "deputation" and in prison. I have visited them in Holloway Gaol, and I realise in some dim way what all this means. I ask who am I who have never suffered the want of a meal for the sake of any cause good or bad that I should condemn my betters? Let me rather praise them for their devotion and their bravery, even while I lament with sincere grief their errors. Their follies are being corrected and will be forgotten; their heroism and defiance will abide as a historical witness against inhuman tyranny and arrogant absoluteness. Though I agree with you in condemning their outrages, yet I "thrill with the joy of girded men" to their self-sacrifice and their fine scorn of suffering. The most significant thing in the situation is not its tragedy of error, which will be expiated in pains and penalties. The most significant and vital thing is also the most kindling and glorious. It is the splendour of womanly daring and courage which will yet be sung in song by our children and be for a name and a praise in all generations.—Yours, &c.,

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham, March 12, 1912.

SIR,—May I be allowed to call in question a doctrine announced, with some solemnity, in your current issue? It is that in which you assert "a distinction which goes down to the very roots of life" between two sorts of martyrdom. "It is only when we suffer," you write, "for acts which are in themselves beautiful and good, as when men calmly persist in some nobler form of worship than public opinion is prepared to tolerate, that our suffering is the price of freedom and peace."

On the low level of the common sense you will probably allow that this doctrine is not ratified by experience. Violence (whether the perpetrators suffer or not) often attains its end; and the conditions under which it is successful are not determined ethically, but by tactical sagacity.

On the other hand, a meek non-resistance has often led to the utter discomfiture of its professors. At least one flourishing Unitarian church has been persecuted out of existence; whereas the Zwinglian Church of Switzerland, whose founder died, sword in hand, on the battlefield, lives in supreme freedom and peace.

A still graver objection, moreover, may be urged against your doctrine on purely moral grounds. How can it be maintained that, without reference to the motives and intentions of the doer, there are certain acts "which in themselves are beautiful and good," and others which are in themselves, by implication, foul and bad? By what imaginable criterion other than the spiritual state of the agent can acts be referred to either of these classes? For my part, I cannot conceive what is meant by moral quality in an "act in itself," where we are forbidden to take into account the moral state of the person who acts.

There is, however, a subtle fallacy into which the spirit of censure is apt to fall; we first decide, according to some rough and ready code of our own, into which class, good or bad, we desire to adjudicate certain acts, and then we impute to the agent so much of good or evil motive as will allow us to satisfy our desire. In other words, acts which we call bad in themselves are really acts in respect of which we are determined not to recognise a good motive.

And what sort of code do we use, in making our initial discrimination of good and bad acts? It is obvious that the only code which will, in practice, work—the only code which commands acceptance—is simply that established by the public sentiment of our day. In the time and land of Jesus assaults on the Sabbath were regarded by the public as much worse than assaults on the person or on property; in our day his Sabbath-breach would be condoned, but a serious view would be taken of his employment of a whip of small cords, and of the up-setting by him of tables laden with cash. What would avail his excuse, that the zeal of God's house had eaten him up, in face of our cold rejoinder, "the act in itself is neither beautiful nor good?"

Let us not confuse morality and police. Police must, of necessity, proceed by code, and that code must be founded on the popular tapus of the day. But it was the life-work of Jesus, in his capacity of moral reform, to establish the principle that morality cannot proceed by any objective code, that it lives in the spirit alone, and sometimes can only fulfil the law by seeming to destroy it.

Josephine Butler (whose name I write with veneration) won a single battle, but the war is not ended. Organised prostitution exists still; the white slave traffic exists; systematic underpayment of women, such as offers to many a choice of starvation, degradation, or suicide, is still among our institutions. To redress these wrongs, and many an other, certain gentle, refined, and cultured women are giving themselves up, day after day, month after month, to toil, obloquy and suffering. At last their law of love has clashed into collision with the code of police. This is a matter for our deep and sore regret. We have the right to review their action, and find it misguided. We have the right to take such counter-action as our own conscience dictates. But have we the right to preach to them, and assail the moral beauty and goodness of their warfare? Must we not rather feel that the heroism and devotion which enables a sensitive, womanly nature to do these last deeds, and face these last contumelies, has stood a test of fire?—Yours, &c.,

E. W. LUMMIS.

Cambridge, March 11.

[The two letters, which we have printed above, seem to require some answer. We shall condense it into as few words as possible. (1) Our correspondents do not really touch the crucial point, which we tried to bring out in our Note last week. We think still that the question is one of morality and not merely of tactics. Does the end justify the means? May we do what we know to be wrong because we think it will hasten the advent of something which we ardently desire? The suggested parallels brought forward by our correspondents are not parallels at all. We have never heard the suggestion that the early Christians did violent and unlawful things, which had no relation to their principles, in order to make themselves obnoxious and wrest by force what they could not win by love. Did not St. Paul make it his boast, "We have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man" ?

(2) The plea for the necessity of violence rests upon a deep pessimism which we do not share. We have sufficient faith in spiritual things to believe that great causes of love and justice do triumph by divine right, though it is not in our power to fix the precise date in the calendar. This confidence is borne out by history. The long struggle of English Nonconformity for civil rights and an equal share in the privileges of education has been crowned with victory, without any attack upon the property of the ancient universities from which for generations Nonconformists felt themselves excluded unjustly. But the best illustration is to be found in the Woman's Movement itself. In every direction new paths of influence and public service have been opened to women during the last thirty years. They have won the municipal vote and the right to sit on town councils and boards of guardians. And this immense social revolution has taken place through a steady education of public opinion and not by violent methods at all.

(3) The line of defence adopted by Mr. Lummis would go far to justify most of the outbreaks of libertinism which have marked the course of Christian history, and the fate of those movements might well serve as a warning against the danger of playing with fire. Our correspondents may disagree with us, and mistake our motive, but we think that the deepest loyalty to the Woman's Movement at the present moment makes it necessary to try to get away from the violent passions which have been aroused, and to examine the deep moral issues with which a new situation has brought us suddenly face to face.—ED. OF INQUIRER.]

SIR,—I do not wish to join in the chorus of denunciation which the tactics of the militant suffragists have called forth, not because I approve of those tactics, but because I think the habit of sitting in judgment on others is an extremely bad one which tends to Pharisaism, destroys sane thinking, and creates a wrong atmosphere altogether. Neither do I wish to add to the labours of those of either sex, and of all parties, temperaments and beliefs who in various ways, some of which I personally cannot agree with, are working whole-heartedly for a noble cause. But the present crisis raises once more the important question as to whether violent methods of obtaining our ends are ever justifiable from the ethical or Christian point of view—and that is the point of view which will surely present itself first of all to readers of THE INQUIRER. The courage of the militants one does not deny, but neither should they deny to others the readiness to suffer, unto death if need be, for truth and justice, although they may have done nothing, so far, to earn imprisonment and hard labour. It is a question of what is the right thing to do, in a moral sense, in order to make truth and justice prevail; and for some of us there can be no swerving from the conclusions borne in upon us as advocates of peace by comparing the methods of the exponents of physical force, whether on the part of the individual or the nation, with those based on reason, the growth of knowledge, and the appeal to all that is best in humanity. The argument that no great cause has ever been won except at the cost of life and property is beside the point. The question for those of us who believe that ethical principles far outweigh considerations of political expediency is this: (1) Can the reign of justice and mutual goodwill be conceivably brought any nearer by acts which even the militants would consider reprehensible in persons who had no great cause to justify (?) them; and (2) is it possible for those who are pleading for international arbitration, and all measures of social reform which tend to promote brotherly relations between men, and for the substitution of the law of love for the law of revenge, to defend methods which, like the piling up of armaments and the belief that nations must always settle their quarrels by war, are driving us back into barbarism? I should like to know how that would be answered by men and women to whom religion and ethics are matters of supreme importance, and who yet defend militancy although it is diametrically opposed to the command to love our enemies. It is no good deceiving ourselves; if we believe that acts of violence are justified in one case they are justified in another, and there is no getting out of the vicious circle. The road of reason is perhaps the longest road to success, but, as Tolstoy was never weary of reiterating, we must oppose to the law of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" the higher law of Christ, if humanity is to make true progress and if love is to prevail.—Yours, &c.,

A FREE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

SIR,—It is clear that my sole concern is with the conversion of sincere, even though sectarian "Christians." On the whole argument I am reminded of Baxter's plaint:—"If you discover an error to an injudicious man, he reeleth into the contrary error, and it is hard to stop him in the middle verity." It is not that you, Sir, or Mr. King, are absolutely "injudicious," but that you are both injudiciously "Christian," can find no support in the conduct and teachings of the Master himself, and are in fact on a lower level than the generous Mohammed in your appreciation of the world's "great masters."

Is it too "diffusive" to read "God" for "Christ"? We of "the middle verity" would not rob "God of any of His flock." We desire, with all our being, to move round "this common centre," and, of ourselves, we would bar entrance to none. "Our personal loyalty and love" go out to God and to all the manifestations of God in human personalities of every age and clime. You speak of "personal loyalties," but apparently you restrict them to one revered and beloved Teacher. We, in the name of Religion and in the very spirit of Jesus, can make no such arbitrary restriction. Where you stand for "Christian" in an artificially narrowing sense, we uphold the more inclusive term "Religion." Baxter in his "Universal Concord" of 1658 let the world see what his religion and his terms of communion were. For his period they were liberal, though not the most liberal. The inclusion of our National Conference is far ahead of Baxter's; and this in spite of any "Christian" suspicions.

Nor is this inclusion a "paper" comprehension. There is no paper about it. To use Mr. King's phrase, it is the "inclusion of affinity." We have not the slightest savour of "paper"; not even the "Love to God, love to Man, in the spirit of Jesus," of the American Conference at Saratoga. Nevertheless, this total lack of "paper" is compatible with the expression of our ardent faith and clearest convictions, as is clear by this decided dissent of mine from the sacred minima of Mr. King and yourself, with whom, I trust, I am in the most real religious fellowship. In no degree do I ignore the compelling necessity of "affinity." Those who would walk together must be able to walk together; but this ability is best proved by actually walking together, and not by pre-determined formal agreements as to terms, or legal limitations whether of the rate of march or the length of the journey.

Consequently it is not for us to judge beforehand who shall or shall not be our comrades on the way. Not even a Christian Shibboleth may be imposed on those who would be our fellow-travellers. We need not fear, indeed, any great or inconveniently overwhelming inrush of allies. No congregation will offer to join us that is not drawn by communities of aim or of method. But it is not ours to bar the open way.

... To avoid misapprehension on the part of Mr. King, I add, that to the best of my knowledge I am not distinguishable in theological convictions from the bulk of my ministerial brethren, and that so far from writing up any one particular interest or theory, I am but advocating the proclamation of the fact that our National Conference is the nearest approach to a Free Catholic Church that our Empire possesses. Personally, I am a Christian—or more.—Yours, &c.,

H. D. ROBERTS.

123, Bedford-street, Liverpool.

[Our correspondents will not remember the virtue of brevity, and we have had to omit part of Mr. Roberts' letter. It is very kind of him to be so deeply concerned for the conversion of the editor, but he need not attribute to him a lack of appreciation for the "world's great masters," which has never been hinted at or expressed. We confess that we find nothing in Mr. Roberts' rather nebulous theories which is likely to shake our loyalty to positive Christianity. Strange as it may appear to him, it is possible for reasonable and broad-minded men to regard the school of Christ with the personal discipline it involves as the best training ground for the development of spiritual freedom and the redeeming energies of the Spirit.—ED. OF INQ.]

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

JAMES HUTCHINSON STIRLING.

James Hutchison Stirling: His Life and Work. By Amelia Hutchison Stirling, M.A. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

THE great physician Harvey, I believe, declared that no one over forty years of age at the time of its promulgation, ever accepted his doctrine of the circulation of the blood. Physiological theories which shut out this conception formed such a large part of the mental stock in trade of the older men that to accept the new teaching would have been like tearing out their very vitals. All the mental dispositions, the bodies of knowledge and modes of thinking, which make up such a large part of what we call our selves, depend for their existence far less than we would wish to believe on their logical coherence, and the axiomatic nature of their foundations. They are bound up with our prejudices, our emotions, our experiences; and in this way they stretch their roots far down into the depths of our being, in many cases drawing their strength from the vivid life of childhood. Hence it is that while by all men the propositions of Geometry are cheerfully agreed upon and placidly accepted, in such matters as Philosophy and Religion, which concern our emotional life, hardly can two men see eye to eye.

These considerations show why the "plain man" is often justified in his complaint that the philosopher does not express himself intelligibly. The philosopher's abstract statements rest on a large body of experience known only to himself, sometimes, indeed, forgotten by himself, yet giving body and form to what, for those who do not possess the illuminating experience, is contentless and vague. It is the life of a great thinker—not, indeed, the mere external happenings, but the growth of thought from its childish beginnings through the stress of adolescence to the serene strength and confidence of maturity—that is the master key to his philosophy. Such a key, so far as sympathy and years of intimate companionship can forge one, does Miss Hutchinson Stirling offer us, in her deeply interesting Life of her father, to the philosophy of the author of the "Secret of Hegel."

As a striking instance of what I have just said, consider this little anecdote of Stirling's boyhood.

"It happened one evening that he was very anxious to accompany his brother David, who was some ten years older than himself, to some place of entertainment, and being refused permission, he determined to go without it. So when his brother set out from the house James slipped out after him, shut the door, took the key with him, and eagerly followed. It was a dark evening, and the boy found it by no means easy to keep in sight the figure of his brother, whose longer strides bore him rapidly through the streets, which were, no doubt, but dimly lighted in those days of the infancy of gas illumination. Absorbed in his one object, he forgot everything else, till, suddenly—he knew not how or why—the thought of the house-key flashed into his brain, and he found it was gone. The shock of this alarming discovery brought his steps, and even his heart, as it seemed, to a sudden stop. For a moment or two he stood paralysed; then, with the spontaneity of instinct, he turned to the only power that could help—in the agony of his mind he prayed to God to help him to find the key. Retracing his steps for a few yards he stooped, and his fingers, groping over the pavement in the dark, closed on something hard and cold. It was the lost key."

A trivial coincidence, shall we say, easily explicable by known psychological laws? A change of motor sensations from his hand as the key slipped down, awaking his attention almost immediately, as any change in sensational experience does; his backward steps directed by subconscious memory; similar or even more remarkable illustrations of the same well-known laws occur to us all every day. An experience, no doubt, carrying to the child a startling conviction of the efficacy of prayer—a conviction, however, easily discounted when later years brought the cold light of reason to bear upon it! The explanation may be true, but the results were far otherwise. Seventy-four years later, in a letter written in 1904, Stirling alludes to this little incident as "having acted as focus to what I say of prayer in the 'Secret of Hegel': prayer must be believed, as it were, to stay the arm that sways the universe." So true is it that it is experience and not reason that determines belief.

Another anecdote tells how young Stirling, at the age of eight, undertook, with no knowledge of the way, to guide a little companion over the twenty miles which lie between Glasgow and Greenock, and how, thanks to "Jamie's" dauntless heart, the two little fellows successfully accomplished the long tramp. This is an early exhibition of that dogged perseverance which served him so well later in his struggle with Hegel. It is encouraging to later students of Hegel to learn how desperate that struggle was. Here is Stirling's own account of his impressions when in Heidelberg he opened the "Encyclopædia" for the first time:—

"The 'Encyclopædia' proves utterly refractory, then. With resolute concentration we have set ourselves, again and again, to begin with the beginning; or, more desperately, with the end, perhaps with the middle, now with this section, now with that—in vain. Deliberate effort, desultory dip—'tis all the same thing! We shut the book. We look around for explanation and assistance. We are in Germany itself at the moment (say); and very naturally, in the first instance, we address ourselves to our own late teacher of the language. 'Other writers,' he replies, 'may be this, may be that; but Hegel! One has to stop! and think! and think!—Hegel! Ach, Gott!' Such a weary look of exhausted effort lengthens the jaw. And it is our last chance of a word with our late teacher; for henceforth he always unaccountably vanishes at the very first glimpse of our person, though caught a mile off."

After seven years of hard reading, involving a systematic study of the whole of German philosophy, and still harder thinking, his own book was begun, and in about fourteen months was completed. "Dipped in the blood of an original experience," as it was, Stirling's work is not easy reading. A witty critic is said to have declared that if the writer had found out the secret of Hegel, he had taken good care to keep it to himself. Yet the book met with an immediate success, rare in the case of a work of such solidity dealing with such an abstruse subject. It did not have to wait for recognition until it had made its own audience. It is, however, from the generation which has grown up within the philosophic influence of Hegel that the verdict most fitly comes. Theirs is the experience which enables them to judge. One of them—Lord Haldane, who contributes a preface to the Life—thus voices his opinion—"The book embodies a result which is likely to be enduring. It will hardly be superseded, for it has the quality of the work of genius. Along the road it has travelled one cannot get any further."

M. D.

In "The Bible in the Light of Modern Knowledge" (London: The Sunday School Association, 2s. net) the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, M.A., furnishes a concise sketch of critical opinion on the growth of the Biblical writings. Opening with a brief explanation of the methods adopted in the analysis of these writings and in their assignment to respective authors and dates, the book follows the history of the Hebrew race from its tribal beginnings till the final disasters under the Roman Empire, and concurrently sets forth the successive literary products as preserved in the pages of the Bible. On the whole the author appears to have been faithful to the general trend of modern criticism, and his volume will be useful in the hands of those who have wisdom and imagination enough to clothe the dry bones of such a summary with something of the living tissues. Specimens are appended illustrating the blending of original sources, the passage from Moore's "Judges" being rather portentous to a beginner, we fancy. The compilation of such a book is a task so exacting that the author must be congratulated who attains so much success as here displayed; but it is impossible to cover everything Biblical in 136 pages. Otherwise we should have expected more notice of the probably contemporary court records in the historical books of the Old Testament, the very important and considerable Jewish (non-Biblical) literature of the generations immediately preceding and following the beginnings of the New Testament, and the suggested sources of Gospel material now receiving so much attention. Mr Hicks falls below his usual level of accuracy when he says that Astruc noted the two divine names in Genesis "about a century ago." As is well known, that writer's "Conjectures" were published in 1753.

LITERARY NOTES.

WE hear with special interest that the course of lectures on the Pharisees, which the Rev. R. T. Herford delivered recently at Manchester College, Oxford, will appear shortly in book form as a volume in Messrs. Williams & Norgate's Crown Theological Library.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

HUGH LATIMER.
1490-1555.

I.

"I have not kept back Thy loving mercy and truth from the great congregation."

TO-DAY we come back again to England, and shall see what came of the work that Wycliff did.

Just about fifty years after the burning of Joan of Arc, in the reign of Henry VII., a boy called Hugh Latimer was born in the village of Thuraston, in Leicestershire. His father was a farmer and a yeoman, and must have been a very honest and good man, for Latimer himself when he was grown up and was a great and famous preacher described in one of his sermons what kind of man his father was, and how they used to live on the farm. He says: "My father was a yeoman, and had no lands of his own, only he had a farm of three pounds or four pounds by the year at the uttermost, and hereupon he tilled as much as kept half-a-dozen men. He had a walk for a hundred sheep, and my mother milked thirty kine. He was able (well to do) and did find the King a harness (suit of armour) with himself and his horse. I can remember that I buckled on his harness when he went to Blackheath field. He kept me to school, or else I had not been able to preach before the King's Majesty now. He married my sisters with five pounds apiece, so that he brought them up in godliness and the fear of God. He kept hospitality for his poorer neighbours, and some alms he gave to the poor, and all this he did of the said farm . . . In my time, my poor father was as diligent to teach me to shoot as to learn me any other thing; and so I think other men did their children. He taught we how to draw; how to lay my body to my bow. I had my bows bought me according to my age and strength. As I increased in them so my bows were made bigger, for men never shoot well except they be brought up in it."—(Brooke Herford—The Story of Religion in England.)

So you see this boy grew up plucky and strong, and not a bookworm or a milksop, though later on he was famous as a scholar and a preacher. When he was old enough he was sent to Cambridge, and there he heard a great deal of talk and discussion about religion, for it was just the time when many good and clever men were beginning to see how much truth there was in what Wycliff had preached a hundred years before, and to wish that the whole of England might give up being Roman Catholic and become Protestant. Latimer was at first shocked to hear all these things talked about so freely, for he had been brought up a Roman Catholic, as nearly every one was then in country villages. But he made friends at Cambridge with a man called Bilney, who was a Protestant, and he talked to Latimer in a way that made him see things differently, and in a little while he was so eager about the new faith that he became well known as a preacher. The students at Cambridge used to crowd to hear him, and other people did so as well. There is a story told of how one day the Bishop of Ely thought he would take him by surprise and came in just when Latimer was in the middle of a sermon. He thought that in this way he would hear whether Latimer were such a determined Protestant as people said. But he heard more than he bargained for, for Latimer, who saw him come in, began to preach about the duties of a Bishop in a very plain-spoken way, and this Bishop, who was fonder of ease and comfort than of doing his duties and taking care of the poor people in his bishopric, cannot have felt very comfortable as he listened to the sermon.

It was a bold thing to do, for although the Bishop thanked him afterwards very politely, he went away and told the great Cardinal Wolsey, who was at the head of the Church, that Latimer preached in a very dangerous way. Wolsey sent for Latimer, and made him repeat what he had said that had vexed the Bishop, but when he heard it he only told him that he had done quite right, and gave him a licence to preach all over England. Perhaps you will wonder at this, but I must explain that King Henry VIII., who had just begun to reign, liked the Protestants better than the Catholics, because he was a man who was fond of having his own way, and he did not like submitting to the Pope and letting the Catholic bishops and priests have so much power in the country. So it came about that Cardinal Wolsey, who was a very ambitious man (that means, you know, that he wanted to be much thought of and to keep a great place), and cared more about getting on in the world than about keeping true to the religion that he professed, used to be afraid of angering the King by being too severe on the Protestants. So Latimer and Bilney and the rest of the "Reformers," as the Protestants were called, were able to go on preaching and teaching. They did not only do this, however, they used to go about everywhere doing good, visiting sick people and prisoners in the gaol. The Catholics, of course, did not like them, and as they were at the head of the Church (which, you must remember, was still Catholic, in spite of the King), it summoned them to be examined about their opinions. Bilney gave in at first, frightened at the threats of the Catholics, but afterwards he was ashamed of himself, and went about preaching the Protestant beliefs more strongly than ever, to show that he repented. This was too much for the Catholics, who took him, and after he had been tried by the Bishop of Norwich he was burnt to death. Latimer was in great sorrow for the death of his friend, but he went on bravely working and encouraging the other Protestants. About this time there was a quarrel between the King and the Pope; Latimer took the King's side, and this pleased him so much that he made Latimer one of his chaplains. But Latimer was always a man who cared more for speaking the truth than for flattering people, even though it might be the King himself, and Henry soon saw that his outspoken ways and plain, shabby dress gave offence to people at the Court, so he sent him to look after a little country parish in Wiltshire. While living there he did one of the bravest deeds of his life.

You know that Wycliff translated the Bible, but in his time printing had not been invented, so that there could not be very many copies spread amongst the people. In Latimer's time another Englishman, called Tyndale, made up his mind that he would make another and in some ways more careful translation of the Old and New Testament, and then get it printed. This he did after much hard work and many difficulties. He and his friends set up a printing-press at Antwerp (in Holland), as, if they had tried to print their English Bible in England, they would have been tried by law and probably sentenced to death. But in Antwerp they were able to carry on the printing, and in two years they printed three thousand copies of the Bible, which were sent over to England with great difficulty hidden in great bales of merchandise. Of course, when the Catholics at the head of the Church found out that these Bibles were being sold, they were very angry, and began to persecute the Protestants and to send them to prison if one of Tyndale's Bibles happened to be found in their houses. Now Latimer was heartily glad that the people should have the chance of reading the Bible in English, and so, when he heard of all these persecutions he was brave enough to write a letter to the King, begging him to put a stop to them. He did not mince his words either, for this is how he ended his letter: "Gracious King, remember yourself, have pity upon your soul, and think that the day is even at hand when you shall give account of your office, and of the blood that hath been shed by your sword." Many men, knowing that the King liked them, would have tried to keep on good terms with him, and would have been afraid of doing or saying anything that might make him angry, especially when it was such a King as Henry VIII., who was very hot-tempered. But Latimer was never afraid of doing anything that he thought right, and the King was sensible enough to like him for it. Though he did not stop the persecution of the Protestants, he answered this letter very kindly, and so Latimer was able to go on with his preaching.

SOUTH AFRICAN NOTES.

SINCE writing last the great event in liberal religious circles here has been the missionary tour of Mr. Tarrant, as a result of which a Church of the Liberal Faith has been established in Johannesburg. This is a great achievement, much greater than those who know nothing of the conditions of South African life are aware of, and Mr. Tarrant is to be congratulated on the result of his work. It may seem, on the face of it, an easy matter to establish a Liberal religious organisation in a town of 120,000 European inhabitants, most of whom belong to the professional and intellectual classes—teachers, lawyers, doctors, surveyors, engineers, and skilled artisans. But Johannesburg, like most large towns, is smitten with the prevailing spiritual blight—indifference to the organised expression of religious life and religious activity—an indifference which, in a town like Johannesburg, naturally shows itself in more materialistic forms than in many other places. It is difficult to say how this indifference is to be met. One critic will urge that we are not militant enough in our propaganda. Another says that the people have lost all interest in theology, whether Trinitarian or Unitarian. A third points out that the churches are completely out of touch with the living social movements and aspirations of our time, and that the Liberal Church is no different from others in this respect. A fourth urges that a "simple Christianity," lived as well as preached, is all that is required to bring the people back to the religious fold. There may be something in all these criticisms. It is true that we are not militant enough in the right direction; it is true that the vast majority of the people have lost all interest in what we may call the old theology; that most of the churches are out of touch with the social movement, and that a "simpler Christianity" is all that is needed. But how much lies in that last phrase! Is Christianity, after all, so simple when we come to apply it to the practical details of our complex modern life? Even in the preaching of it do we not come up against a world of ideas, thoughts, feelings, habits, and customs, which make the preaching of it, and the living of it, a very intricate and complex matter indeed? Our difficulties will not diminish, they will tend rather to increase, if we close our eyes to the infinitely complex nature of the task that lies before us. Let us recognise, once for all, that we are pioneers, that we must accept all the dangers, disadvantages, and glories of pioneer work, that such work must mean, for a time, comparative isolation, but that we shall slowly overcome the forces which make for this isolation by throwing ourselves wholeheartedly and without fear into whatever public work calls for our aid, and with whatever party or Church our work calls us to associate. Other churches, and the churchless, will then see that our Christianity is a real and living thing, not a mere intellectual attitude or spiritual luxury, and we shall draw towards us, or be ourselves drawn towards, whatever forces are making for deeper, truer, and stronger spiritual life.

The Rev. G. Coverdale Sharpe was heartily welcomed on his arrival in South Africa by both the Cape Town and the Johannesburg congregations, and he has now settled down to the difficult task which lies before him. I hear that he speaks of Johannesburg as "a Garden city." Probably he has not yet been down any of the holes in the garden. When he has, he may find parts of his Eden rather sulphureous. He has the hearty support of a loyal and earnest committee. He notes, however, that in Johannesburg, as in England, even Unitarians and Liberal Christians are not enthusiastic churchgoers. I hear from other sources that he has already made a favourable impression, and that the congregation is gradually increasing.

At Wynberg (eight miles from Cape Town), where we started monthly services as a result of Mr. Tarrant's lecture, we had an average attendance of between thirty and forty, but as our committee thought that our Cape Town services were suffering through my absence we were reluctantly obliged to discontinue the Wynberg services. The Wynberg friends are confident that with a man on the spot, able to devote the whole of his time to the work, a self-supporting Liberal Church could be firmly established in a couple of years' time.

Since I wrote you last an incident has occurred which shows how inadequately the strongest Church in South Africa interprets and applies the principles of Christianity. Until quite recently, in the four colonies, or provinces as they are now called, the Dutch Reformed Church in each province had its own Synod and system of church government. But a movement for the union of the D.R. churches throughout South Africa was set on foot some time ago, and last Session a Church Union Bill was introduced into Parliament to legalise the necessary ecclesiastical arrangements. As everyone knows, the colour prejudice in the northern provinces is much stronger than it is in the Cape province; so strong that while, in the Cape, coloured people are frequently admitted as members of the Dutch Reformed Church, in the north they are refused membership. The question then arose as to what would be the status of a coloured member of the Church should he remove from the Cape to either of the northern provinces. Would he be refused Christian fellowship in the Church of which he was already a member? This is actually the effect of the Bill as passed—the Dutch Reformed Churches in the northern provinces may refuse to admit, on the mere ground of colour, the Dutch Reformed Church members from the Cape province. The defence of this provision, even by the promoters of the Bill, was hollow, half-hearted, and apologetic. They must choose the lesser of two evils; they must bow to the inveterate colour-prejudice in the north; they were only doing in the Church what the State had already done in the Union Constitution, in excluding the coloured people from the full rights of citizenship. These arguments were soon riddled by leading speakers on both sides of the House. Mr. Merriam pointed out that "the whole object of the Church was not to follow politicians, but to lead them in the right way. What shocked them in this clause was that it was totally opposed to the principles of Christianity which were professed by the Church for which they were legislating. What would the Master have said about this clause on the shores of Galilee? It was in the equality of humanity that lay the whole strength of the Christian religion, and he regretted that in a Bill dealing with the Church they should have a clause which put in legislative language that a man of one colour should not worship with the man of another colour. To put down in the Act, in the charter of the Church, the colour line, did seem to some of them right against the principles of Christianity. It was so different from some of the other Churches, so different from a Church which they despised, and which they thought infinitely below themselves—the Mohammedan Church. Therein lay the whole strength of that Church. A man, no matter what his colour, was a brother, and was admitted, and could worship with the Sultan of Turkey himself. That was why Mohammedanism was making such advances in South Africa, while Christianity was not. He deplored it." Other speakers followed in the same strain. "They were going to have this Union," said one, "at the cost of truth and honour, and at the cost of the doctrines they taught every day. The thing was monstrous;" and Mr. Henderson (Natal) asked: "Would the promoters of this Bill refuse to go into church with the twelve apostles, or would the twelve apostles be considered coloured persons?" But what is the use of argument where blind and ignorant prejudice holds the field? The clause was carried by a majority of 24 in a House of 78—another instance of the tail wagging the head.

Another incident which has recently occurred shows what a low ideal prevails on this matter, not only in a sectional church, but throughout the State. A Boer farmer named Moller, who lives in an up-country district, had married a coloured woman of half-European descent, and had sent his children to the public undenominational school of the district. The parents of some of the other scholars objected to the presence of Moller's children in the school on the ground of their colour, and the school managers decided to refuse admission to the latter. Moller took his case to the highest Court, and the Chief Justice and other judges have decided, in accordance with the Cape School Board Act of 1906, that the managers of the school are acting within their legal rights in excluding any child who is of non-European parentage. Moller has to pay his education rate all the same, while his children are excluded from the State schools towards the maintenance of which he has to contribute.

I saw it stated, a short time ago, on the authority, apparently, of a South African newspaper, that the South African Labour Party had passed a resolution demanding the exclusion of the coloured people from the franchise. This is not so. The Labour Party has declared itself against any further extension of the franchise to the natives, being in favour of governing the natives through a native advisory council. Many people in all parties are in favour of this policy. But many of the coloured or half-coloured people are quite as civilised as many white people, indeed more civilised than some whites, and there is no political party in South Africa that I am aware of that has declared itself in favour of depriving the coloured people of the franchise, though there are many people who would like to do that. What we want in South Africa is not a colour line, but a civilisation line.

MANSFORD STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

Annual Meeting.

THE annual meeting of subscribers and friends of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday evening, March 12, Mr. Charles Hawksley, being in the chair. Mr. Ronald P. Jones, secretary, who presented the financial statement in the place of Miss Louisa Jones, the retiring treasurer, who was unable to be present, pleaded for increased subscriptions to meet the growing needs of the Mission. The Minister's report, which was read by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, was very encouraging, and laid special emphasis on the loyalty and devotion of all who were co-operating with him in the work. The most encouraging feature of the year was the first Welcome Service, held on Palm Sunday, when seven new members joined the church and were publicly welcomed by the minister and congregation. It was hoped that such a service might become a regular feature of the church life. A beautiful roll book of membership had been presented to them by several friends, and this they hoped might be the means of binding the members still more closely to the church. Mr. Cooper made special reference to the Preston Club, which has been joined by many of the old members and several of the present members of the Boys' Own Brigade.

"There are now between 50 and 60 members, the great majority of them about 16 years of age. Mr. Parker still acts as secretary and steward of the club, and I am most anxious to get him further assistance in its management. These lads want a few good friends to come and help them in their club life—to spend a few evenings a week in their club with them to organise their games, and generally to interest themselves in the club and its members. The position at present is most encouraging and full of promise for the future, if further help is forthcoming. And, further, I am not without hope that the presence of many of the old Brigade boys in the club may be the means of drawing the club more closely into connection with the church."

The Provident Bank still continued to be one of the most useful institutions connected with the Mission. The figures for 1911 show there were 1,040 depositors who paid £668 into the bank. The organisation of the country holidays had also demanded a great deal of time and attention.

The Hampstead rooms were filled with regular visitors—26 in all—from April 24 to October 19; 19 others, members of the congregation and Sunday school, were entertained at Bernard Cottage, Southend; 51 children were sent away for a fortnight to Halstead and 47 to Lewes; 15 of the teachers and older scholars were accommodated at Pett, near Hastings; and 5 other cases were provided for, either wholly or in part. In addition 19 boys joined the Boys' Own Brigade camp at Deal.

Mr. Hawksley moved the adoption of the reports.

Dr. Drummond, of Oxford, in seconding the resolution, expressed his unabated confidence in the aims which lay behind the work of the Mansford-street Mission. The resolution brought to his mind many happy memories and hopeful prospects for the future, and gave him a feeling of religious calm amidst the social and industrial unrest of the present time, for he had not reached the age when men felt that all good lay behind and all evil in front. He recalled the days, more than 50 years ago, when he used to go down to the Spicer-street Mission. In recent years they had heard a good deal about the "atmosphere" of schools and institutions, and he thought it was a very good word. In Spicer-street he always found an atmosphere of devoutness, of quiet calm, of peace and brotherhood which immediately impressed the visitor, and which could be traced to the influence of that revered and beloved man, Mr. Corkran. He trusted some of the younger students found it as inspiring to go down to the Mission now as he used to find it in his own youth. All hope for good results, he continued, depended upon the deep human influence of those who went about among their fellow-men and helped to redeem and uplift them. Teaching was a good thing, and much might be done in that way, but the redeeming and uplifting power of teaching depended upon the soul that was behind it. Character alone could create character. All who were engaged in the work of Mansford-street Mission brought to it a spirit of pure and loving kindness. They were drawn by deep pity for sufferings which they felt they could alleviate. They felt a strong compassion for those who were greatly tempted, and to whom they could impart strength to withstand those temptations. They regretted the want of faith and the scepticism which prevailed at the present time, and would go in the ardour of their convictions to speak to those in whom the religious consciousness was only awaiting their kindling touch. In all this work the church was the focus. He believed in the strong moral power, the humanity and inspiration of religious worship. The religious influence should be everywhere present in all the activities connected with a Mission, and if depth of character and depth of faith were found within the hearts of those who superintended those activities, their influence must inevitably spread although they might not be able to trace its effect in visible lines. They might be perfectly sure that it was going down into many a heart, and that even those who were not conscious of it were being raised to a nobler standard of life. They all wished to do what good they could, added Dr. Drummond, but personally he felt in regard to various legislative proposals that although they might be very useful and necessary, there was always in them an element of uncertainty. But in their religious work they could have no doubt, for that was founded upon an impregnable rock. Wherever lofty purposes, pure brotherly sympathy and loving kindness existed, they did good. The best of institutions if worked by the selfish would prove failures; while even imperfect institutions when carried out in the spirit of brotherhood would slowly evolve into something better. The greatest want of the present day was the growth of this spirit of Christianity, this deep inward life, this common love of man for man which rose above all class distinctions. This they must try to bring home to the hearts of others, and so their influence would spread in ever-widening circles, and their efforts would be blest.

The Rev. H. Gow and Dr. Blake Odgers also spoke, the former laying special emphasis on the religious influence of missions like Mansford-street. They were never more needed than at the present time, he said, for they ministered to a perennial need which no other institutions, however admirable in their aims, and however nobly carried on, could meet. The Rev. Gordon Cooper, in responding to a very cordial vote of thanks for the earnestness and devotion with which he carries on his work, expressed his deep sense of obligation to the band of helpers associated with him, and said that he was not without hope that a University Settlement would one day be established at Mansford-street.

Mr. Arthur Punnett was appointed treasurer in the place of Miss L. Jones, whose resignation has been accepted with great regret.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

THE fifty-second annual meeting was held in the Oxford-street Chapel, Accrington, on Saturday, March 9. Mr. J. R. Cameron presided over the business meeting. The report which was presented recorded the highest average attendance at the general committee meetings attained for many years past, if ever before. The main feature of the year had been the receipt of the contributions of various churches to the Jubilee Fund. Twenty-one churches had made such contributions, and one more promised help. The fund would be kept open for some time longer, and the treasurer would not present his balance sheet before the annual meeting in 1913. The financial statement for the year 1911 showed a balance due to the treasurer of £121 10s. The report was adopted on the motion of Mr. J. R. Cameron, seconded by Mr. Wilde. On the motion of Mr. Cameron, seconded by Mr. Webster, a welcome was extended to the Rev. W. J. Piggott, late of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, who has settled at Burnley (Trafalgar-street Church) and to the Rev. James Crossley, who has taken charge of Ansdell after 17 years' ministry at Birkenhead. Mr. John Mather was elected President for the ensuing year, and the Revs. E. D. Priestley Evans, Bury, and R. Travers Herford, Stand, Manchester, secretaries. A service was afterwards conducted by the Rev. W. J. Piggott, and an address given by Dr. Mellone. In the evening a meeting was held at the chapel, Councillor Cameron presiding, when the speakers in addition to the chairman were the Rev. H. D. Roberts, Dr. Mellone, and Mr. J. Wigley, Manchester.

A UNITED SUMMER SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL SERVICE UNIONS.

A UNITED summer school has been arranged by the Inter-Denominational Conference of Social Service Unions which will take place at The Hayes, Swanwick, Derbyshire, from June 22 to 30. A most interesting programme of lectures has been arranged, attention being focussed on certain aspects of the Social Problem, which is too big to be dealt with as a whole. The programme includes, under the sections "The Child" and "The Youth," lectures by Mrs. Margaret Alden, M.D., on "Environment," Mr. Charles E. B. Russell on "Adolescence," and Mr. R. A. Bray, L.C.C., on "Youth and Industry." Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Mrs. Phillip Gibbs, Mr. R. Seebolm Rowntree, the Rev. Will Reason, the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, D.Litt., and others, will speak under the section "The Adult Worker," and on Saturday evening, June 22, Prof. Muirhead will address the students at the opening meeting on "Problems and Prospects of Social Reform."

Swanwick is beautifully situated, and all who join the summer school are sure of spending a delightful holiday, as well as having the opportunity of making friends among the members of the various Unions which will be represented, and of hearing a series of interesting and instructive lectures on social questions of the day. One who has been there writes enthusiastically of the happy times which he has spent at The Hayes. "It would be impossible," he says, "to find a more attractive spot in which to hold any sort of conference or summer school. The original house and garden are still intact, and give a pleasantly homelike and dignified air to the whole estate. The garden is an immense asset, with its four or five tennis courts, its shady orchard, and its wide lawns. The hall of the house is an ideal resort for a wet day. It is supplied with comfortable armchairs, and contains a beautiful organ. From the house a passage leads into the new rooms round 'The Quad,' and on the other side there is the dining hall, built by the Conference Estate Company, and capable of seating about four hundred. It is a delightful, airy, cheerful room. It has doors leading into the kitchen garden, at the top of which stands the hostel, which provides sleeping accommodation for about three hundred. A popular feature of The Hayes is the Restaurant. In this white and red-tiled room, decorated with great vases of flowers, thirsty lecturers and students congregate to refresh themselves with milk, lemonade, or bowls of fruit and cream. Here, too, you may buy notebooks, pencils, photographs and other paraphernalia necessary to the student. Verily, an ideal place for the recreation of body, mind and spirit. Those who visit The Hayes will hear with regret the local equivalent of the Parliamentary cry—'Who goes home?'"

The inclusive charge for single bedrooms is 5s. 6d. per day, or 35s. for the week, i.e., from tea on Saturday, June 22, to breakfast on Saturday, June 30. 5s. is payable as a booking fee on application, and is not returnable. The balance of 30s. must be paid not later than Monday, June 24, 1912. Further information may be obtained of the secretaries of the various denominational Unions, or direct from the Hon. Secretary of the Summer School Sub-Committee, Mr. J. J. Stark, Ashmead, Orleans-road, Upper Norwood, London, S.E.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE half-yearly meeting of the Board of Managers was held at Essex Hall, London, on Friday, 8th inst. Four beneficiary members became entitled this year to receive the pensions for which they, with the assistance of the Fund, have subscribed; two others are already in receipt of theirs; and in two cases small annuities are paid to aged ministers. Two new beneficiary members were elected, the number being now over 100. The annual report and financial statement were adopted and ordered to be printed. The subscription list has been brought up to £297 7s. 4d., but is still rather short of its original standard, to which it ought to be restored. Thirty-nine congregations were included in the list of subscribers, their contributions amounting to £64 12s. 7d. Arrangements were made for the triennial meeting of subscribers and members of the Fund, which is to be held in Birmingham at the time of the National Conference, on Thursday, April 18, at 6 o'clock.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

POOR LAW REFORM.

THE discussion on Poor Law Reform this week in the House of Commons will provide the thoughtful student of social questions with material for reflection. Mr. Burns' invincible optimism and faith in himself and his Department might lead the unwary to suppose that Poor Law Reform was unnecessary. Everybody is doubtless interested to hear that so small a number of children under three years of age are in metropolitan workhouses, and that a team of Poplar Poor-Law boys (under Mr. Burns' captaincy) could hold their own against a second eleven from Eton or Harrow, but what has become of the Report of the Poor Law Commission of 1909, which, pace Mr. Burns, is the most remarkable, informing, and valuable sociological document that has appeared during the last 100 years?

Seeing that this ponderous document on its first appearance sold like the latest novel at the circulating libraries, that the heart of the thoughtful public was stirred by it as by nothing else within living memory, that on the part of both sections of the Commission there was so damning and irrefutable an indictment of the Poor Law system as it exists, it might have been supposed that nothing could have been easier than for a Government to concentrate at least upon the changes suggested by both sections of the Commission. Failing this, at a later stage, subsequent to the issue of the Report, the County Councils' Association devised a compromise between the Majority and Minority sections of the Commission, which was accepted by the most prominent members on both sides. A Bill on the lines suggested by the County Councils' Association could have been passed with far less controversy, and when passed might have been far more effective than an Insurance Bill.

* * *

It is so obvious that one is ashamed almost to point out—and we are grateful to Mr. Walter Long for mentioning it in his speech on the debate—that the irreducible minimum of reform, long, indeed, overdue, was to carry out the proposals of the Royal Commission on the Feeble-Minded and the Departmental Committee on Vagrancy, with regard to which there is no sort of controversy whatsoever. If the feeble-minded and vagrant, or in general terms, "the unemployable" class had been dealt with, some clearance would have been made towards a beginning of dealing with the complicated questions of unemployment and a "living wage."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE annual meeting of subscribers and friends of the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel will be held on Monday, March 25, at 7.45 p.m., when

Mr. Charles Hawksley will occupy the chair. Tea will be provided at 7 p.m.

A COUNCIL Meeting will be held on Wednesday, March 20, at 3.30, in the Council Room at Essex Hall, in connection with the British League of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women. Mrs. W. Blake Odgers will preside. Miss Brooke Herford will present a report on her recent visit to Lancashire and Yorkshire, and an address will be given by Mrs. Davies, of Wakefield, on "The Intellectual Advance of Women and the Opportunity of the League."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Edinburgh: St. Mark's Chapel.—The new organ, built by Messrs. Ingram & Company, was inaugurated by an organ recital on Friday evening, March 8. The handsome Renaissance case of the old organ has been used to enclose the new instrument. The new organ is stated to be an excellent example of all that is up to date in the modern art of organ building.

Gorton.—At a largely attended meeting of the congregation of the Brookfield Church, held after evening service on Sunday, March 10, it was decided to postpone the bazaar advertised in recent issues of THE INQUIRER. It was felt that it would be unfitting to appeal for public aid at a time of deepening depression and poverty. If the coal strike should soon be settled the bazaar will, in all probability, take place on May 1 and the three succeeding days.

London: College Chapel, Stepney.—The annual distribution of prizes to scholars in the Sunday-school took place on Sunday, March 10, when Miss Tagart presented 44 prizes for attendance, conduct, and attention during the year 1911.

London: Peckham.—The annual meeting of the congregation of the Avondale-road Church was held on the 5th inst., when the reports submitted showed that the Church and its various institutions were progressing favourably, and giving substantial promise of future development. The change of ministers which occurred last autumn naturally acted as a slight check on progress, but the increased attendances for the past three or four months afford a gratifying testimony to the appreciation of the Rev. Douglas Robson's ministry. During the evening the Choir Master, Mr. G. V. Carter, was presented with a silver-mounted conductor's baton, the presentation being made by Miss Cooley on behalf of the Choir members.

London: Wandsworth.—The annual general meeting of the congregation was held on March 6, and there was a good attendance of members. The committee's report was adopted and officers elected for the ensuing year. Mr. C. Hawksley, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was present, and tendered the thanks of his committee for the permission given for the Rev. W. G. Tarrant to undertake his missionary tour in South Africa.

Sheffield: The late Mr. G. C. Snaith.—The Upper Chapel has suffered a serious loss in the death of Mr. G. C. Snaith, which took place on March 6. Born at Darlington, where his family were attached to Unity Church, he went to Sheffield at the age of 21, and after 11 years there, started business as a bookseller on his own account. He was much interested in everything that related to literature, and was a member of the Sheffield Playgoers' Society, and of the Literary Society connected with Upper Chapel, where he had worshipped for many years. He had served on the chapel committee, and took an active part in the work of the special committee which prepared the beautiful liturgical services at present in use. It was his desire early in life to become a Unitarian minister, but this proved to be impracticable. He occasionally acted as lay-preacher, however, until ill-health prevented him from doing so. Mr. Snaith leaves a widow, but no family. The funeral took place on Saturday, March 9, at the Sheffield City Crematorium, the service being conducted and an address given by the Rev. C. J. Street. Reference was also made by the minister on Sunday morning at Upper Chapel to the loss which the congregation had sustained.

Stalybridge: Hob-hill School.—A four days' bazaar, in aid of the fund for defraying the expense of the extensions and alterations to Hob-hill School required by the Board of Education, has resulted in the sum of £1,112 being realised. The actual cost of the improvements was about £1,800, towards which £800 had previously been received in subscriptions and donations. The opening ceremony on the first day was performed by Miss Beatrix Potter, of London, Mr. Wm. Thompson presiding. Mr. Kenyon gave a short account of the work in connection with the alterations, together with the names of those who had generously helped them with donations. The bazaar was opened on the second day by the Hon. Mrs. Wood, wife of Mr. John Wood, M.P. for the borough. The chair was taken by the Mayor, Alderman J. Ridgard, J.P. Councillor A. M. Fletcher, J.P., of Hyde, performed the opening ceremony on the third day, Colonel J. W. Pollitt, V.D., J.P., presiding; and Councillor J. Bottomley, J.P., opened the bazaar on the last day, when the chair was occupied by Mr. Edwin Oliver. The room was beautifully decorated, and all the arrangements were successfully carried out by those responsible for the work of organisation.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY ON THE REVISED VERSION.

Professor Saintsbury has explained his refusal to sign the recent memorial on New Testament revision as due not to any love for the work of the revisers, but to his deep repugnance to tampering in any way with the literary splendour of the Authorised Version.

"With everything that was said by the memorialists against the existing 'Revised' version," he writes in The Times, "I heartily concur, and had I been present I should have gone beyond any of them. From the Chair which I unworthily occupy I never fail to take up my parable and give my testimony against that abomination of desolation. But to better it by tinkering the 'Authorised' is a very different matter. The subject of English prose rhythm is one to which I have given great and increasing attention for a very long time; for the last two or three years it has occupied almost my whole leisure. And I have become more and more certain that not the most accomplished master of style who ever lived could or can, save in obvious falsetto and by occasional tours de force, even imitate the styles of the past, still less patch the actual coats with his new-old stuff. Even Lamb, whose powers in this way were unique, never attempted the latter task; and I feel nearly certain that he would have been horrified at the notion."

THE BAHAI MOVEMENT.

The teachings of the Bab, and of Baha'u'llah, which have been referred to several times in our columns, are the subject of an article by Mr. Harrold Johnson in the Contemporary Review. "Bahaim," he says, "claims to have the adhesion of at least one-third of the Persian people, including members of the ruling family, viziers, parliamentary deputies, governors, and many religious teachers or Mullahs. It has numerous followers in European and Asiatic Turkey, Egypt, India, Burma, and has excited considerable interest in Japan, Siam, Ceylon, Russia, Germany, France, the United States of America, and in Great Britain. . . . It counts followers also among all the great religions of the world, and it is not an infrequent occurrence in such a cosmopolitan city as Rangoon, for instance, to find Buddhists, Mohammedans, Christians, Jews, Zoroastrians, and Hindus met together, united by Bahaim into one family of love—race, caste, sect, dietary distinctions, age-long severing customs and prejudices all obliterated and merged in the white light of the unity of faith."

CONFERENCE ON DIET IN SCHOOLS.

We understand that a conference on "Diet" in public, secondary, and private schools in connection with the National Food Reform Association will be held at the Guildhall on May 13, the Lord Mayor presiding at the opening session. The large and representative committee includes Mr. F. B. Malim, Headmaster of Haileybury; Mrs. Scott, Godstowe School; Dr. Clement Dukes, Hon. Consulting Physician, Rugby School; Dr. M. D. Eder, editor of School Hygiene; Miss J. Watson, Association of University Women Teachers; Dr. T. N. Kelyack, editor of The Child; Professor F. Murison, editor of the Educational Times; and others. The programme is as follows:—(1) Diet as a factor in physical, intellectual and moral efficiency; (2) existing methods; (3) the main lines of reform; (4) instruction in the elements of physiology and personal hygiene; (5) problems of institutional feeding; (6) training in institutional management. Full particulars, with conditions of membership, &c., may be obtained on application. It is proposed to call a further Conference to consider the feeding of elementary school children and those in charitable institutions.

A MASQUE OF LEARNING.

Professor Patrick Geddes has just organised a pageant of education through the ages in Edinburgh, which began on Thursday and ends to-day. The scheme was arranged in celebration of the semi-jubilee of the University Hall of residence, and it comprised a presentation of the aspects of culture of all the great civilisations, Eastern and Western, ancient and modern; from the Egyptian, Indian and Chinese systems, through the Greek and Roman, Celtic and Mediæval, to the Renaissance and encyclopædic epochs, and the ideal union of city and university. Such a programme almost leaves one breathless, but it will give some idea of the ground which is covered by Professor Geddes in his comprehensive scheme. We should like to see the same idea carried out in London, or in the university towns of England. Such pageants, besides stimulating the imagination and giving more colour and beauty to life, have a high educational value both for those who take part in them and for those who only look on.

WOMEN ASTRONOMERS.

At the present time several women astronomers are holding official positions in the British Astronomical Association. One is director of the observing section for meteors, auroras, and zodiacal light, another has made journeys to Lapland, Russia, and Trinidad to observe total eclipses of the sun. Miss Everett, who had a brilliant academic career, was for some time at Greenwich Observatory, where the introduction of women astronomers has proved a most successful innovation. In France, Mlle. Edmée Chandon has just been made Assistant Astronomer at the Paris Observatory by Ministerial decree, being the first woman to be appointed to such a position.

THE INTERNATIONAL PROHIBITION CONFEDERATION.

A memorial petition was sent out to all ruling Sovereigns as the result of the recent Conference held at The Hague by the International Prohibition Confederation. Replies have already been received from the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Belgium, Sweden, Portugal, Mexico, and the United States of America. The memorial drew the attention of the various Rulers to the destroying power of intoxicants throughout the world, and urged that in the best interests of their subjects the objects which the Confederation has in view should receive the most careful and sympathetic consideration of all civilised Governments.

* * *

A lengthy resolution was passed by the Conference, respectfully urging the properly constituted authorities in every nation throughout the world to make prompt and thorough investigation by competent specialists as to the economic and ethical effects resulting from the use of alcoholic and other intoxicants, and requesting that during such investigation public evidence be taken, and that, when the collective reports giving the results of such investigations be made, they be fully made public. The resolution further urges that if the ascertained facts be such as to warrant the expressed opinions of the Conference, that prompt and effective measures be adopted for the suppression of the manufacture, importation, exportation and sale for improper uses of all intoxicants throughout the world.

OUR AIMS ARE:

1. By religious and educational methods to bring to bear the great body of Free Church opinion on the removal of the sex barrier as it relates to the Parliamentary Franchise.
2. That the Free Churches should do their part in keeping this great movement religious; and not allow it to drift, as other great movements have done, beyond the Church. As Dr. SCOTT LIDGETT says: "An effort to advance the movement on truly religious and thoughtful lines is most urgently called for at the present time; to commend it to the best womanhood of the country."
3. Though the gaining of the vote is the primary, it is not the final aim. It is hoped that the League will carry on a great work of Education, so that the vote may be used to remove some of the foulest stains from our civilisation.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Coal Strike lies with deepening shadow upon the national life, and every other interest has been driven into the background. Owing to the large stocks of fuel which had been accumulated the suffering has not been so severe as many people anticipated, but every day great masses of the population come closer to the brink of starvation, and it would show little knowledge of human nature when it is driven to desperation by hunger if we expected the present tranquillity to continue. So far the gloomy prophecies of rioting and violence have been completely falsified by the quiet demeanour of the strikers and the other workers who are compulsorily idle. The self-restraint both in speech and action are worthy of the highest admiration from all classes of the community.

* * *

ON Tuesday night the Prime Minister brought in his Bill for the establishment of a minimum wage in coal-mining. It is an interim measure designed for the special purpose of extricating the country from a dangerous crisis, and it is proposed that it should remain in force for three years. Mr. Asquith explained that the Government was satisfied that there are cases of frequent occurrence where miners working underground are prevented, from causes for which the individual miner is not in any sense responsible, from earning what he is willing and able to earn. They proposed to meet this state of things by securing a reasonable minimum wage on the one hand, and adequate safeguards on the other, to protect the owner against slackness and deficiency of output.

THE Bill marks a departure of a very momentous character in industrial legislation, and all reasonable men will deplore the necessity of its introduction at a time when haste is the one condition of safety. Subject to whatever modifications or improvements may be introduced by Parliament it is the one scheme which has any promise in it of saving the country from untold suffering and disaster, and those who criticise or oppose it can only do so, consistently with patriotism and loyalty to the common good, if they have some other plan to put in its place which will secure the same end more swiftly and surely.

* * *

WE cannot, we think, say more than this usefully at the present moment, as the crisis changes not merely from day to day, but from hour to hour. In regard to our own duty we may add a further word. Indirectly a great deal depends upon the general temper of the country, its self-control, its breadth of mind, and its sympathy. There ought to be a real effort to rise above class interests and partisanship of every kind and to brace the will for the personal sacrifices which may be demanded for the common good. Nations like men come forth from the testing hours of life either ennobled or defamed, weakened in moral fibre or stronger for noble effort.

THE friends of peace are somewhat divided on the subject of the flamboyant candour of Mr. Churchill's speech on the Naval Estimates on Monday. On the whole there seems to be some advantage in looking at the facts of the situation quite plainly instead of through the mist of conventional phraseology, and the effect upon German opinion as reflected in the more responsible newspapers has not so far been one of aggravation. The Koelnische Zeitung, for instance, says that the speech is not regarded as a challenge or a threat, nor as intended to impede the negotiations pending between Germany and Great Britain. On the other hand, to lay down a fixed ratio of superiority is a curious preliminary to cordial friendship and will do little to counteract the temper of suspicious watchfulness, which is so liable on both sides to outbreaks of popular hostility on very slight provocation.

IN the House of Commons, on Wednesday night, Mr. Churchill made an important addition to his statement in answer to criticisms by Mr. Murray Macdonald. "Negotiations," he said, "have been for some time in progress between this country and Germany for an exchange of naval information, and we shall be very glad if these negotiations reach a satisfactory conclusion. We have nothing whatever to conceal in the scale of our shipbuilding. We shall always be ready to allow it to be known what ships we are in process of constructing, and, within general limits, when they may be expected to be completed, provided we receive reciprocal facilities. What we want to avoid is suggestions that vessels are being constructed apart from those shown in the regular returns. It would be a great benefit if that element of suspicion could be eliminated from the naval relations of two great Powers. Lastly, if we assert our claim, as we intend to do, to a supreme position on the seas, it is also our duty so to conduct ourselves that other nations will feel that that great power and that responsibility—which are a necessity to us—shall be used in such a manner as to be a menace to none and a trust held for all."

PERHAPS the friends of peace may find some ground of renewed hope on the one hand in the definite promise that if Germany reduces her rate of naval construction we will at once do the same; and, on the other hand, in the frank recognition that our gigantic expenditure on armaments is industrially ruinous and morally unjustifiable. The old militant spirit has gone, it no longer rings true to the needs and aspirations of modern democracies, and, instead of it, we have words like the following, which, not many years ago, would have sounded strange indeed on the lips of the First Lord of the Admiralty:—"The spectacle of naval armaments which the nations of Christendom afford at the present time would no doubt excite the curiosity and wonder of future generations. Here were seen all the polite peoples of the world, as if moved by a spontaneous impulse, devoting every year an immense and ever-growing proportion of their wealth and manhood and of their scientific knowledge to the construction of gigantic military machinery which was obsolescent as soon as it was created, which fell to pieces almost as soon as put together, which has to be continually renewed and replenished upon an ever larger scale, which drains the coffers of every Government, which flouts the needs of every people, which was intended to be the means of protection against dangers which had perhaps no other origin than in the mutual fears and suspicions of men."

* * *

A COMPLIMENTARY dinner was given in London on Tuesday night to Mr. Ebenezer Howard, as a tribute to his work in connection with the garden city movement. Mr. Howard, in acknowledging a presentation, said that the public had not begun yet to realise what the garden city movement meant. It meant a reconstruction so vast in its extent, so deep and searching in its effects, that what they were doing at Letchworth was no more than George Stephenson had done when he built his first Rocket. The garden city meant a new potentiality to the vast areas of land in this country which were lying idle and desolate.

* * *

SUBSEQUENTLY Earl Grey said it was their object to promote the extension of the garden city principle until it should cover the urban development of the whole of the United Kingdom. It is significant that the planning of the new capital of India at Delhi will be under the control and supervision of men who have come directly under the influence of Mr. Howard's ideas, and that at the meeting on Tuesday personal tributes to the value of his work were received from the Presidents of the German, French, Polish, Belgian, and Spanish Garden Cities Associations.

A NOTABLE TERCENTENARY. The Unitarian Martyrs of 1612.

THE act of killing a man is at all times shocking, but things that shock may be thought needful for the better state of things to come. To risk the shock in the interests of religion was at one time considered right and wise. Clearly all depends here on what religion is conceived to be. That Christians should put one another to death strikes the modern mind as a disastrous contradiction of the spirit of the Gospel. That they should do so for the honour of Christ is strangest of all. And yet history shows us that the last subject upon which unsparing zeal survived, even to the burning of men, was the doctrine of the Trinity.

In the sixteenth century a large number of men and women were destroyed in different parts of Christendom for daring to express opinions contrary to the particular theology set up by the authorities. Romanists executed Protestants, Protestants executed Romanists. Reformers killed those whose "reforms" differed from their own. Anti-Trinitarians rarely were tested by the possession of power; it is to their credit that in Poland and Transylvania, where alone they attained political ascendancy for a while, they favoured liberty of thought. Yet even there the persecuting temper appeared, and for the honour of Christ, to whom he refused to offer "worship," Francis David, the apostolic founder of Hungarian Unitarianism, was imprisoned fatally (1579).

In England, fourteen years later, the three martyrs of Independency, Barrow, Greenwood, and Penry, were hanged; but their "schism" was considered to be "seditions." No suggestion is made that Bartholomew Legate and Edward Wightman, who suffered execution by fire in 1612, were chargeable with anything but heretical opinion. In the loose terms of the time, they, in common with others who were burned long before, were called "Arians." They agreed in denying the dogma of the Trinity; their affirmations were far from being identical. Enough; for the honour of Christ their judges sent them to the stake.

Bartholomew Legate, a dealer in cloth lists, was one of three brothers, all accused of similar heresy. In Edmund Jessop's "Discovery of the Errors of the English Anabaptists" (1623) we read:—"There were (among others) three Brethren, ancient Separatists from the Church of England, living sometimes in the City of London, their names were Legat; these held it stiffly that there must be new Apostles before there could be a true constituted Church, and they drew it from this their ground, the one was called Walter Legat, who about twenty years since [i.e. circ. 1603] was drowned, being with one of his brethren washing himself in a river, called the Old Ford; another of them called Thomas Legat, died in Newgate about sixteen years since [c. 1607], being laid there for the heresy of Arius; the third called Bartholomew Legat, was burnt in Smithfield about ten years since, being condemned for the same heresy of Arius, for they all held, and stood stoutly by the same."

In his Church History, Fuller describes Bartholomew as in "person comely, complexion black, age about forty years; of a bold spirit, confident carriage, fluent tongue, excellently skilled in the scriptures; and well had it been for him if he had known them less or understood them better, whose ignorance abused the word of God, therewith to oppose God the Word; his conversation (for aught I can learn to the contrary) very unblameable; and the poison of heretical doctrine is never more dangerous than when served up in clean cups and washed dishes."

The same authority says James I. tried in vain to argue him into orthodoxy. At his trial a very large number of ecclesiastics were present. He was sentenced to death and on Wednesday, March 18, he died. Fuller says: "To Smithfield he was brought to be burned. See here it is neither the pain nor the place, but only the cause makes a martyr. In this very Smithfield how many saints, in the Marian days, suffered for the testimony of Jesus Christ! Whereas now one therein dieth in his own blood for denying him. Vast was the conflux of people about him. Never did a scare-fire at midnight summon more hands to quench it, than this at noonday did eyes to behold it. At last, refusing all mercy, he was burned to ashes. And so we leave him, the first that for a long time suffered death in that manner; and O that he might be the last to deserve it!"

A few weeks later Edward Wightman died. He had been several times "examined" in the previous year, and stood for trial during seven days between November 19 to December 5. He was a draper, of Burton-on-Trent, apparently long known in the district as eccentric in opinion, but borne with by the local Puritans as a visionary person. At last he wrote a pamphlet of eighteen leaves which came into the hands of James I. Neile, the Bishop of the diocese (Lichfield) found the consistory court so crowded on the second day of the trial that he could not get in, and he thereupon ordered it to proceed in the Chapel of the Blessed Virgin. Laud, then chaplain to the Bishop, took part in the trial. The account of the sentence shows that among Wightman's beliefs was "that Jesus Christ is only man and a mere Creature, and not both God and man in one person." A curious opinion is cited against him, that he considered himself to be the "Prophet spoken of in the eighteenth Chapter of Deuteronomy," "the Comforter spoken of in the sixteenth of St. John's Gospel," and "the Elias to come," spoken of by Malachi. However, strange such a notion appears, Wightman is said to have steadily adhered to it and his other heretical opinions. Being asked if his answers were made "deliberately and freely of his own Accord without distraction of mind or other distemperature," he replied, "My Lord, Why do you ask me such a Question? I think you seek to disgrace me thereby. I say, that upon deliberate advise and consideration and freely I have made my said Answers, and I do and will stand to them." The poor fellow was taken out to be burnt on Monday, March 9; but at first yielded to the torture of the flame and was freed from the stake at some cost of scorching to his rescuers. But later, refusing to recant "in a legal way," he was taken out again and burned on April 11, it appears, being the day before Easter Sunday that year.

In Fuller reference is made to Wightman's death, and to the imprisonment till death of "a Spanish Arian," and then follows a notable passage:—

"Indeed, such burning of heretics much startled common people, pitying all in pain, and prone to asperse justice itself with cruelty, because of the novelty and hideousness of the punishment; and the purblind eyes of the vulgar judges looked only on what was next to them, the suffering itself, which they beheld with compassion, not minding the demerit of the guilt which deserved the same. Besides, such being unable to distinguish between constancy and obstinacy, were ready to entertain good thoughts even of the opinions of those heretics, who sealed them so manfully with their blood. Wherefore King James politiciely preferred, that heretics hereafter, though condemned, should silently and privately waste themselves away in the prison, rather than to grace them and amuse others with the solemnity of a public execution, which in popular judgments usurped the honour of a persecution."

But a recent discovery at the University Library, Cambridge, is reported in Mr. Champlin Burrage's "Early English Dissenters," just published, which shows that the disposition to burn this class of heretic was not extinct after the tragedies of the spring of 1612. One William Sayer was examined before Bishop Jegon, of Norwich, about November 25 in the same year, who in his report to Archbishop Abbot says:—"He refuseth to recant and abjure publicly his first defence and publishing of his denial of the Godhead of Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Ghost, and obstinately persisteth," &c. In evident trouble, Jegon declares that no pains have been spared to bring the heretic to a better opinion, and Abbot's reply would almost seem to show that for his part he did not want another burning case on his hands—observe the words italicized below:—"My good lord," he writes to the Bishop, "I have received your letter making mention of one William Sayer, a desperate heretic, who out of malice rather than out of understanding maintaineth many profane and schismatical opinions. Those eight positions contained in the enclosed paper are the doctrines of the Barrowists and Separatists of this age, but joined with some points of the Anabaptists. . . . But it will never be assented to, that he should burn as an heretic, unless he deny something expressly contained in the three Creeds or in the four first General-Councils. I do find an obscure mention in the latter part of your paper, as if this Sayer had denied the Godhead of Christ, and of the Holy Ghost. If he persist obstinately therein, the Law will hold of him as it did this last year upon Legate and Wightman, to frie him at a stake (!). But it is not clearly delivered what he affirmeth in those points, and therefore I can give no certain answer unto it." So ends our present information about this man.

In 1639 Neile, who had become Archbishop of York, wrote to Archbishop Laud urging Wightman's fate in the case of a man, John Trendall, as another "blasphemous heretic." In 1646 the hanging of Paul Best was voted by Parliament. In 1648 the Westminster Assembly petitioned for the death of John Bidle. Political circumstances, rather than reasoned principles, prevented their execution. But zeal for the honour of Christ after the bad old fashion still endured, and poor Bidle died in 1662, the victim of repeated imprisonments. In 1689, Unitarians were denied the freedom accorded to dissenters by the Toleration Act. It was only as late as 1813 that they were legally set free. Would that even now the truer spirit of religion had abolished all traces of the prejudices that have so long excluded them from Christian fellowship.

THE CRITIC SPEAKS.

DEAR SIR,—When you arrange the news,

And write your weekly leaders,
Remember, please, the private views
Of individual readers.

Your attitude is somewhat queer
For a progressive paper;
Your logic's faulty; and, we fear,
Your principles are vapour.

We all, of course, are honest men,
And broad, and liberal too, sir;
And this explains why, now and then,
We tell you what to do, sir.

You should have done it long ago.
Before the trouble started:
You're too impulsive, much too slow,
Too bold, too chicken-hearted;

Too academic, sir, too stiff,
Too gentle, and too shrinking;
But all may yet be pardoned, if You'll write what we are thinking.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

EDWARD CARPENTER'S WORK.

It is thirty years since Edward Carpenter began to give utterance to the message which we now associate with his name—a message whose profound significance it is difficult to estimate, and whose large content it is not easy to measure. And this because it is the message of a prophet, and not merely of an exceptionally gifted intellect. His "Towards Democracy," for all its searching thought and rare passages of beauty, is an inspired rather than an intellectual or artistic achievement. Indeed, it may truly be said that it is only his in so far as his subsequent books prove to us that he has identified himself with it. And in such volumes as "Love's Coming of Age," "The Art of Creation," and "The Drama of Love and Death," he has done this. They discuss and elucidate much of the material which is found in a first inspirational form in "Towards Democracy." They are not in the nature of evidential proofs of his teaching; rather they provide the sympathetic reader with such carefully chosen materials and indications as may best enable him to share in the mystical vision and experience of the writer. Thus the works which now stand to Carpenter's name represent an important body of thought, and I venture to suggest that no living writer has contributed so much out of his own vision and experience to increase the content of faith. He is above all things a seer of the ultimate reality.

Yet it may be alleged that he is neither a great nor an original thinker. His work may be contrasted with that of his contemporary Nietzsche, who also was born in 1844, who also had the passion for music, and whose inspired book* of "Zarathustra" dates from the same years as "Towards Democracy." There is an intellectual virility, an often swaggering but always remarkable sense of verbal mastery in the one that, on the whole, we miss in the other. But then Carpenter's work has a spiritual integrity which Nietzsche's, for all its dazzling suggestion, has not. The German is like the soul possessed by a legion of spirits; at war with himself, his brilliancy degenerates more and more into a bewildering display of fireworks. The Englishman, while giving spontaneous expression to the several aspects of his message, co-ordinates all together—the many-coloured rays producing at last a pure, intense, and steady light.

This is only to emphasise the statement that Carpenter is primarily a seer, and an initiator of others into the mysteries. His writings and his personality assure us that few men have passed through experiences so pregnant with mystical significance; and his genius (which is rather that of the musical revealer than of the plastic or dramatic artist†) is marvellously fitted to interpret those experiences in such a way as most to stimulate the spiritual apprehension of others. These experiences have given him a different outlook upon the worlds of thought from that of his contemporaries. He views things from another plane. He seems to have climbed higher up the mountain, and to look out over our heads. And this gives their value to his several books, which deal with the fundamental problems of human life, the arts of living, of loving, of thinking, of dying. These matters of supreme importance, both to society and to the individual, he looks at from a new point of view. He regards each from the standpoint of the Spirit which is Man. Almost alone among living teachers, he has the intense realisation of that true freedom which belongs to the full-grown human spirit. How few there are who can help us to-day even to a glimmering of this vision, by which we might for ourselves begin to estimate spiritual values! But for those who learn how to read him, Carpenter does this.

And what teacher can do more? If only we could grasp the nature of the needs of that Spirit which it is our personal business to express in our individual life, giving it fullest possible scope, letting it act and express itself in each daily relationship—if we could recognise this divine element, and let it have its way with us—if we could apprehend this third and paramount person in our own trinity of body, soul, and spirit, this divine stranger whom neither the senses of the body nor the self-conscious intelligence of the soul seems able of itself to recognise—then I suppose that we should speedily emerge from among the futilities that so largely occupy our energies, into a new attitude towards the universe. We should know ourselves “children of God” to fulfil the labour of the Spirit; we should create and enjoy that supreme human energy which is severally described in its different aspects as love, as faith, and as freedom. What, then, is this essential underlying reality of our personal lives? What is “Spirit”? That is that obscure problem which everything that Carpenter has written tends to elucidate and to solve. And while his books have much in them which is akin to elements in the work of William James, of Bergson and of Eucken, for example, he seems to me to adventure further than any of these in pursuit of his ultimate vision, and therefore to offer, to those who can read him with sympathy, a more emancipating, and, from a spiritual point of view, a more complete message.

Having said this, however, I must venture to make a criticism. Returning for a moment to the comparison with Nietzsche for a text, one feels that Nietzsche’s fascination lies largely in his realisation (however inadequate and perverted) of the pre-eminence of real power, and consequently in his emphasis upon the human “will to power,” as the confutation of mere religious passivity. Now, in spite of his “Art of Creation,” I feel on a certain side the lack of this element in Carpenter—a lack which, in so far as it exists, almost excuses the otherwise futile criticism of his work as too speculative for this work-a-day world; and I feel it especially in a sense in which Nietzsche certainly would not. In Carpenter’s study of human evolution I think he underestimates the necessity for those simple affirmative acts by which our faith draws down and assimilates the forces of the upper world, in order to use them upon earth. Such acts are, properly speaking, included in the term “prayer.” Carpenter seems to me to neglect this all-important aspect of practical Christian teaching. I do not myself believe that any quasi oriental discipline of thought or desire—necessary though this is—can effect that fertilising junction between the transcendent world of the highest spiritual forces and the plane of our daily relationships which the will to power demands. Without the practice of this vital prayer I believe that the spiritual potency of the race will suffer partial paralysis, however high and cosmic the state of consciousness to which it may attain.

I have left myself little space in which to speak of Edward Carpenter’s latest volume. His “Drama of Love and Death”* (which is not a miracle play, but “a study of Human Evolution and Transfiguration”) deals with the passion and art of love; with dying, and the meaning of death; with the nature of personality, and with the probable character of the after-life. The method employed is daringly constructive in its broad, free handling of debatable materials. Thought is here stretched if it may grasp the ineffable and apprehend the intuitive. And withal, in so good-humoured a way, with such friendly colloquialisms and confidences, as well as with such sublime passages of Platonic eloquence, that the reader, who is himself a fellow craftsman in life and not merely an interested observer of it, may gather infinite advantage from these pages. It is true that to the statical and critical intelligence each succeeding chapter may seem more unjustifiable than the last, and I suspect the book is not for such. By those, however, who are struggling with the unknown and adventuring into the unseen, many of the indications given in these pages will be immediately recognised; some of the way that is mapped out will be found already familiar. They, for their part, will readily understand why the pedestrian intelligence cannot understand; why the backward-looking intellect cannot assent to the living discoveries of intuitional knowledge. And yet the book is packed with evidences of wide and close study of physical, biological, and psychological research. It is the work of an alert and clear-eyed student of the wide field of modern thought. While one may not be able to assent to each of the important decisions to which every page bears witness, I know of no work which so wisely and faithfully prepares the way for human endeavour in fields of perilous enterprise; no truer herald of that new advent of spiritual power which I am convinced is now at hand.

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

A REVISED DECALOGUE.

PROBABLY the majority of English people would regard any attempt to revise the decalogue as sacrilege. The “ten words” are still taught in the people’s schools, and proclaimed by churches of varying creeds as God-inspired rules of conduct. That the law of Sinai is sufficient for to-day seems to be usually accepted without demur, notwithstanding the reminder of the teacher to whom all the churches profess allegiance. “Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time” “But I say unto you” After such declarations by the Founder of Christianity it seems astounding that the decalogue should still occupy such a prominent place in the services of the church, while the Beatitudes and the two great commandments of love to God and love to one’s neighbour should only be referred to incidentally. It provides another illustration of the truth of Emerson’s famous generalisation that “the doctrine of the Old Testament is the religion of England.” This view has been re-echoed by Mr. A. C. Benson in a recent number of the Fortnightly Review, in which he points out with much force that the qualities most acclaimed by the upper classes of this country are those which derive their sanctions from Old Testament teaching. The virtues most in demand are “good sense, good humour, courage, and well-bred self-sufficiency.” Most people, he adds, are more anxious to be respectable than to be pure in heart. It is true there is a movement among liberal churchmen for a reform in the prayer-book, but it has received so much opposition from the upholders of tradition that little progress can be expected for the present. When the time arrives, it will be interesting to note what position will be assigned to the Mosaic code.

To people who are accustomed to take things for granted, the commandments stand in no need of revision. There are others, however, who feel, and feel strongly, that whatever importance might have been attached to them by the Jews of the Exodus, they are altogether inadequate as a statement of the moral code of to-day. Such people are prepared to admit that while each commandment contains a germ of truth, there is not one which does not need amplification or re-statement in the light of present-day needs.

It is almost unnecessary to quote instances in illustration of the position here affirmed. The discouragement of art in the second commandment, and the unsatisfactory position assigned to women in the tenth, will occur to everyone who has thought about the subject. No one, however, will dispute that both these commandments call attention to evils against which the Englishman of the twentieth century needs to be on his guard as much as the Canaanite of old. Indeed, it must be acknowledged to our shame that each of us is in danger of falling short of the restricted morality we are attacking. It still seems difficult to keep the ninth commandment, if our neighbour happens to be a politician in the enemy’s camp. In most respects, however, the moral sanctions of the best thought of the time are far in advance of those to which the majority of the religious world still owes verbal allegiance.

* Thus it is seen at its weakest in “The Promised Land,” a drama in “the Elizabethan style,” but destitute of the objective Elizabethan spirit.

* London: George Allen. 5s. net.

While there is much talk about the necessity for a re-statement of creeds, and a revision of the services of the churches, it is only in isolated instances that anything is done. In the case of the Church of England the difficulties are immense, and the only course for the reformers to pursue is to continue to proclaim their views, in season and out of season, until they convince the majority of the reasonableness of their demands. The non-conforming churches have, however, more freedom if they choose to exercise it. An excellent example of what might be done in this direction is to be found in the book of services compiled by Dr. Hunter for the use of the congregation at King's Weigh House, but outside Unitarianism such instances are rare. Even in churches where the new theology is professed, the hymn books and service books often remain unchanged. Strange to say, one of the most notable examples of the attempt to give new life to the old forms by such amplification and re-statement as we are advocating, has been undertaken by a church which stands aloof from all the sects. The West London Ethical Society, which has now been in existence for more than twenty years, was originally a Sunday lecture society. The intellectual fare provided by the lecture was, however, found to be inadequate. Innovations were gradually introduced. Hymns and canticles were followed by statements of principles in which were embodied the ethicist's creed.

By such gradual accretions a form of service has at length been evolved which bids fair to rival those of the orthodox churches. It is to this most heterodox Society that we must turn for an illustration of what might be done to bring the English prayer-book up to date. Strange, indeed, that the revision of the prayer-book should be begun by a Society which excludes prayer from its services. The responsive services, now adopted by the Society for occasional use, owe their inception to a feeling that the members of the congregation should have more opportunities of actively participating in the services. By beginning with the decalogue and the litany, a link is provided with the past, and the continuity of the religious aspirations of mankind is affirmed. It is only with the growth of the feeling that the spirit is more than the letter, that such a re-statement as Dr. Coit has attempted has become possible.* It may, perhaps, be objected that the ten commandments deal too much with the negative side of morality, but so long as the new forms are not used too often they may serve a useful purpose. At any rate, the contrast between the old and the new will arrest attention, which is so much to the good. When the setting becomes too familiar, a further revision should be attempted, for familiarity and real reverence are not often found growing on the same stem. Although the putting of new wine into old bottles is said to be fraught with danger, there would seem to be less objection to putting old wine into new bottles. At any rate, that is how the matter appeals to Dr. Coit, and we are inclined to agree with him.

As the ninth commandment has been referred to, Dr. Coit's version may be quoted as an illustration of the spirit in which he has performed his self-imposed task.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour; neither shalt thou misrepresent or withhold from him any fact or any conviction of thine own which it were best for the social life that he should know."

The response which follows this, and all the commandments except the tenth, seems somewhat feeble. It is as follows: "May no one lead us into temptation, but all men help us to keep this law."

This pious wish appears almost futile, and the reason for its insertion is not clear. It should not have been difficult to provide a form of response less open to criticism. To return, however, to the commandment, it will readily be admitted that such a re-statement cannot be heard once, twice, or even ten times without stimulating the moral judgment of everyone who has a spark of religious feeling. Moreover, the added portion is sufficiently vague to furnish ample material for thought, and in this fact lies its chief value. A commandment should allow for mental and spiritual growth.

So long as forms of service are recognised as aids to the spiritual life, so long will such innovations as Dr. Coit has here provided perform a useful purpose. The "universal litany," which is included in the little volume, lends itself to more controversial treatment, but Dr. Coit's defence should receive due consideration. As a contribution to present-day religion the booklet deserves wider recognition than it has hitherto received.

MISTAKEN MARY.

I SOMETIMES think that Mary McNally spends most of her life making mistakes. I am certain that I spend a good deal of my own time in attempts to set her right—vain attempts.

For instance, how can I—how can anyone—alter what, according to some present-day theories, was Mary's initial mistake in being born at all under the circumstances? These were, poverty; being one of seventeen children, and sharing with them the influence of a father, stunted, little more than half-witted, and ill-tempered, what we sometimes describe as being "as cross as a brier and as thick (stupid) as a ditch."

Brier! Ditch! The words suggest the question in some roundabout way: is poverty harder to bear in town or in country? I do not decide; only there is something dreadful in the incongruity of small famished feet racing along flowery roadsides under bowering hawthorn and wild rose.

"When me mother would go to see a sister of her's that was middling snug," Mary relates, "we'd run to meet her, to see would she be bringing us e'er a bit of bread . . ."

"Is it that you'd be hungry?"

"Sure, betimes she'd have nothing for us, only Injia male stirabout, and a sup of sugar and water."

Under such conditions it seemed best to let Mary "go to sarvice," she being, as well as she remembers, about nine years old. Such "sarvice" means generally plenty to eat, anyway. It did for Mary, and she still insists that the mistress of the rough plentiful farmhouse meant to be kind.

"Didn't she larn me to read and write?" says Mary, who is fond of a newspaper and a great hand at sending Christmas cards. And let me not omit mention of her letters. I often get them, but they are cryptic puzzles and life is short.

Indeed, her mistress tried to teach her quite a number of useful things, such as the habit of hard work. To this end Mary was required to carry turnips or potatoes in a sack, upon her back.

"Middling weighty they do be," Mary observes, reminiscently, "and she'd have a little switch if I'd be too slow bringing them along . . . Me mother used to wonder at me when I'd be let home of a Sundah evening, the way I'd sit down on a low little creepy-stool and straighten meself against the wall; but that used to ease the pain in me ba—a—ack . . ."

"Why didn't you tell your mother?" "I didn't think . . . sure what sinse had I?"

And this silence is the first mistake for which Mary can be held responsible; and all children make it. They bear too much in silence. Fortunately, young Mary found a champion. A labourer noticed and pitied her and spoke about her. Mary was taken home—taken to the doctor; "rale good to me he was!" Mary finds goodness in the most unlikely places. But he couldn't do much; Mary's back has accompanied her all her life of labour since. Well, of course, it—the back itself—had to; I mean the pain. Mary has never resented the "little switch," but I confess to a desire that there should be punishment to fit such crime. It was like breaking the wing of a young bird.

For ever since this backache has handicapped Mary. She has lost many a good place through it. People can't do with a weakly servant. Even during the last dozen years or so, which she has been spending in a home where what you are is weighed against what you can do—even here Mary's back comes against her. The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. Mary undertakes impossible feats of household labour, only to break down and be nursed. This, and her insistent chapel-going through all weathers, are, however, only some of her mistakes. I pass over her love of a dance. What would life be without an odd purple patch?

Mary's mother is as ill-judging as herself. Of late, she has undertaken the charge of three orphan grand-children. The alternative for them would have been the Union, loathed unspeakably by Mary and her class—foolishly, no doubt. When I remonstrated over this mad arrangement, "Sure, what else!" says Mary cheerfully, "company they do be to me mother, now that all of us is gone out from her to work. And rale useful little Molshy is, that's the biggest of them—can run to the shop, and get a quart can of water from the well; and she's gôn to school now, as played as Punch, brings a penny every Monday the way she'll get a cup of coffee and plenty of milk at twelve—thrivin' ahead on it she is too, God bless her! Condensed milk is all me mother can get—when she has the price of it. The people about won't sell milk—it's some law there does be out about inspection, but sure I don't know!... But they'll give you a sup when they can. An' you'll often hear it said, God Almighty has some little way of His own, annont to us, of keeping the full spoon with children like them..."

* Two Responsive Services with a Commentary by Stanton Coit, Ph.D., West London Ethical Society, Bayswater, 6d.

These children are the joy of Mary's heart. She never wearies telling about them and their amazing and desirable qualities, and the grand little clothes "me mother does make" for them out of some impossible rags you have bestowed—only to these mistaken ones nothing is impossible!

I have known Mary give, literally, the boots off her feet, the clothes off her poor back, to satisfy some needy member of that "long" family of seventeen. They have no scruples about turning to her in need. Sometimes it is Pat that wants the "lind" of ten "shillin's" to plant the potatoes; then Christina has a grand new place ready to go to, only she's short for aprons and shoes. The last straw was when Judy "was marryin'," and that mistaken Mary flourished off a new hat for the bride, and a "brides-cake," and a breakfast.

"If you only seen how lovely she looked! and them all said the cake was grand!"

You can't reason with Mary.

Once, almost by force, was she induced to put money into the Post Office Savings Bank. It amounted to a whole five pounds once, after some five-and-twenty years "at sarvice." But it wasn't long untouched. I believe its a good business principle not to leave money idle. Mary may be a mute inglorious financier carrying this theory into practice. Anyway, as I have intimated, you only waste your breath when you remonstrate.

"What's to become of yourself if you get really worse, and have to give up? You must think of that!"

"Sure, so I do! Isn't God good? And too sure I am that them all will pay me back the few shillings, whenever they have it to spare themselves!"

"Whom is it for this time? Another wedding?"

"Ach, no!" says Mary in a disappointed way, for she dearly loves a bit of fun; "it's me mother. The turf she's anxious about. Me father that fell out with the people at the bog, so she has to hire a man to get it for her; and so..."

"You'll leave yourself without a penny!"

"It's me mother it's for this turn! I couldn't see her at a short! And if the money's gone, what matter?"

Indeed, I had no reply. Did it matter? What does matter? Has not God chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise? I'll let Mary be.

"METHODS OF VIOLENCE."

SIR,—I acknowledge your chivalry in printing your critics at length, to the compression of your own reply; and I ask leave to rejoin.

To your chief count against me, that my line of defence would justify libertinism, I joyfully plead guilty. The word "justify," as here used, is the antithesis of "condemn," and one of the most precious results of my principle—that morality cannot proceed by any objective code; it lives in the spirit alone—is that it withholds us from condemning anyone, unless he has clearly acted on a base motive, in defiance of his own conscience. Wherein, sir, lies the danger of this charity? What the better are we of condemning people? What the better are they, or the world at large, for our condemnation? The cacoethes damnandi seems to me one symptom of a lamentable tendency, through which the fallacy of hatred continually creeps into men's hearts, clinging parasitically to the logic of love. The italicised words in the following phrases reveal its insidious working:—I love my own country, and hate her enemies. I am a loyal disciple of Christ, and cannot associate with any other prophet's disciples. I respect the rights of property, and have nothing but condemnation for fanatics who infringe them.

Not only was my principle with its corollary held and explicitly stated by Jesus and Paul, and consistently practised by Jesus, but I suggest, sir, that you, also, have recourse to it in your reply to me. No longer able, when confronted with the whip of small cords, to condemn the deeds of militant suffragists, simply as lacking goodness and beauty "in themselves," you fall back on the imputation of a bad spiritual state. You ask, "May we do what we know to be wrong...?" The answer is obvious, but it depends on my principle, not on yours. To maintain your original position you ought to ask, "May we do what we believe to be right, though we know that other people will condemn it as wrong?"

The motive and intention of all the suffragist prisoners whom I have the honour to know are pure and lofty beyond our ordinary experience, and I judge the unknown by the known. But I am not pleading for a mere stay of execution. I repudiate your jurisdiction. The property guarantee is given by half the population; the other half are not committed to it to the extent of a single vote. How, then, does it bind them?

In conclusion, I protest earnestly against your one-sided and inexact use of the word "violence." On the one hand we see personal assaults, foul insults, imprisonments, stripping, forcible feeding, maiming, doing to death; on the other hand, the breaking of window panes; and it is this last that you denounce as violent!—Yours, &c.,

E. W. LUMMIS.

Cambridge, March 19.

[When Mr. Lummis takes refuge in motives and intentions which are "pure and lofty beyond our ordinary experience," he is simply reverting to the pernicious idea of a kingdom of the saints free from the moral restrictions which bind ordinary men. We think that most readers of St. Paul's Epistles will be able to picture to themselves the scorn with which the Apostle would have repudiated the sophistry of our correspondent's position. Spiritual freedom in the New Testament has nothing to do with moral anarchy, either in theory or practice.—ED. OF INQ.]

THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON VIVISECTION.

SIR,—In your note on the Report of the Royal Commission on Vivisection, you point out that the Commissioners believe that there is a more marked preponderance of professional opinion "against the opponents of vivisection" than was the case in 1875.

I have not yet had the opportunity of reading the Report itself, but, according to the extracts in the papers, it admits "that certain results claimed from time to time to have been proved by experiments on living animals, and alleged to have been beneficial in preventing or curing disease, have on further investigation and experience been found to be fallacious or useless," and these include certain cases as to which a definite claim had been put up before the Commission of 1875, which now has to be withdrawn.

It appears, then, after all, that one of the most serious allegations of "the opponents of vivisection" has received the formal endorsement of the Commissioners; and I think it is important that this should be written on the front (as indeed it is by the Commissioners themselves) of their general statement that from their point of view the attack has failed.—Yours, &c.,

THE SPIRITUAL BASIS OF LIFE.

Life's Basis and Life's Ideal. By Rudolf Eucken. Translated with Introductory Note by Alban G. Widgey. Messrs. A. & C. Black. Pp. 374. 7s. 6d. net.

THE more we study modern life the more we must become convinced, with Professor Eucken, that the great need of the day is a positive philosophy of life as a whole, a centre around which our culture can group itself. The keynote of the great Jena professor's work is struck in the preface to the present volume: "There can be no enduring life of genuine culture unless humanity is inwardly united by common aims." But this inner unity cannot be attained without metaphysics. In spite of the present unpopularity of the word, Eucken is not afraid of announcing himself to be a metaphysician, for he believes the craving for a unified conception of life to be essential to human progress. "Life's Basis and Life's Ideal" is a plea for a new metaphysics based, not upon abstract concepts, but upon the life-process itself and its experiences. Eucken would lead us towards a moral and religious position, which, while holding fast what was of permanent value in the old, shall absorb the content of the new.

There can be no doubt that the religious, social, and educational work of to-day suffers in the severest possible manner from the absence of a positive philosophy. We have no definite, acknowledged system of values, and the modern man is therefore apt to feel that his life is lacking in inner meaning. We are surrounded by a chaos of individual opinions and are fain to cry, with Pilate, "What is Truth?" Under these circumstances, the modern world falls back upon a negative idea, an idea which might truly be described as the dominating conception of present-day life—the elimination of suffering. Important as it may be to alleviate or remove suffering, this cannot in itself raise the level of life. The essence of all real progress has always been a strife towards a high positive goal, a struggle carried on even at the expense of great suffering. As Professor Eucken himself says: "Not suffering, but spiritual destitution is man's worst enemy." Most, if not all, great spiritual advances have been accompanied rather by an increase of human suffering and conflict than by a diminution of it; but humanity has felt that something was being gained that was worth the sacrifice. Joy and pain are so curiously interwoven in our human life that it is more than likely that a movement aiming merely at eliminating suffering will also eliminate a great deal of joy. In this connection it should be pointed out that the modern movement towards the removal of risk and suffering from life has only one logical end—the extinction of human life itself; for how can the race be continued except through risk and suffering?

The first portion of "Life's Basis and Life's Ideal" is chiefly taken up with a criticism of the main attempts which are being made in the modern world towards the construction of a philosophy of life. Naturalism, socialism, and aesthetic individualism are in turn examined. In each case Eucken notes the same failure to grasp man's essential nature, to penetrate to his innermost being. These systems fail to satisfy man for the simple reason that they do not realise what man is. In its haste to avoid metaphysics the modern world has failed to face the great problem of the nature of man. There is probably no better way of approaching Eucken's own position than by making some attempt to answer, on his own lines, the all-important question: What is man?

That man is claimed to a very large extent by nature is obvious. But we come to the crux of the whole matter when we ask: is there not something in man (and that the highest) which in some way lies beyond nature? On p. 114 we read: "Even the most zealous champion of the claims of nature cannot deny that man achieves something distinctive; we not only belong to nature, we also have knowledge of the fact; and this knowledge is in itself sufficient to show that we are more than nature." Knowledge, even of the simplest kind, involves the operation of a unifying power, "there must be a unity of some kind ruling within us; but the mechanism of nature can never produce such a unity." Man could not construct, as he actually does construct, a systematic conception of the surrounding world unless there worked within him some force quite different from anything which could arise as a mere continuation of natural processes. We are thus brought to the great central idea of Eucken's philosophy. Man belongs in his innermost nature to the spiritual world. In him we see a manifestation of the spiritual life. This spiritual life is not, as Eucken's critics would have us think, something vague and more or less imaginary. It is quite a tangible reality. Who can deny that there is something in man which renders him capable (for example) of constructing and organising vast systems of ideas, and who can believe that this "something" is a material thing? Eucken regards the spiritual life as the essence of reality; it is much more actual to us than is matter itself, in fact it is in finding this spiritual life within himself that man finds his own true being. For man, by virtue of his participation in the spiritual life, acquires a cosmic and universal character, rising above what is merely individual. Since the spiritual life is an independent, eternal, and objective reality, Eucken's philosophy escapes all relativism, humanism, and pragmatism. It is an absolute philosophy. Yet it avoids the usual remoteness of the absolutist school, for this spiritual life is present in man, with an effort he can reach it and base himself upon it. Through his own activity he can participate in it.

It is in the spiritual life that we are to find Life's Basis, and not in the world of nature. In this life alone man acquires firmness and elevation above the mere flux of worldly phenomena; we may now say, in Francis Thompson's words:—

"Firm is the man, and set beyond the cast

Of fortune's game and the iniquitous heart."

The spiritual life imparts definite values and norms to human life. It operates within us by means of inner necessities which impel us in certain directions and raise us above all mere individualism. Religion and morality acquire reality and power by bringing man into contact with the spiritual life, by enabling him to enter into a sphere of absolute values. This task of elevation is, however, an exceedingly difficult one, and Life's Ideal is to be found in its accomplishment. Eucken's philosophy is therefore one of struggle and conflict, of spiritual activity; it is an appeal to raise the level of life, to set life upon a new and stable basis.

This book should be a great help to all who are seeking to understand Professor Eucken's thought; its whole arrangement is simple and clear, and there can be no difficulty in following Mr. Widgery's lucid translation.

MEYRICK BOOTH.

A JAPANESE REFORMER.

A Peasant Sage of Japan. Translated from the Hōtokuki by Tadasu Yoshimoto, with an Introduction by Dr. Estlin Carpenter. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 4s. 6d. net.

"A MAN'S mind seems so small, yet one sincere mind will move the gods, and heaven and earth will be moved too." So said Kinjiro Ninomiya, a wise man of Japan, born in the year 1787, who spent his life in the service of others, and, after his death, received the name of Sontoku (Respecter of Virtue, or the Virtuous). Sontoku—himself one of the most transparently sincere and unselfish men who ever lived—seems to have realised at a very early age the supreme importance of single-minded devotion to duty and to truth, and all through his life he held that the slightest flaw in a man's integrity not only resulted in trouble to himself, but in misfortune to his descendants. He belonged to a type of reformer rare in all ages, being characterised by an unlimited capacity for self-sacrifice, which he also demanded of others in the most uncompromising manner, combined with that gift of commonsense and practical judgment which is often lacking in the idealist. His love of humanity was as great as Tolstoy's, with whom, up to a certain point, he would have had much in common; but he was saved, probably by the fact that he had been born a poor man, with a less complex personality and a more prosaic mind, from the mental and spiritual torture which Tolstoy endured because of his inability to throw off the burden of wealth and share the simple life of the peasant. Sontoku was also very far from desiring to criticise the methods of government in his own country, and his conception of the relations which ought to exist between a "lord," his "retainers," and the tillers of the soil was based on the feudalistic system which is as strongly rooted as ancestor-worship in Japan. Nevertheless, he urged that the great landowners should live frugally, guiding and teaching the peasants, and distributing their wealth to the needy. He himself shared the burdens of the poor, including their poverty, even when he had won the favour of the Shogun by unremitting labour for the public good and might have claimed the highest rewards. "There was at no time any contrast between his own life and the lives of those he served, nor was there contradiction between his teaching and his way of living." In his early days he suffered "ten thousand hardships," and when his help was sought, time after time, in the work of restoring ruined estates, villages, and provinces to order and prosperity, or feeding thousands of starving individuals when the country was ravaged by famine, he knew how to carry out his schemes with the sympathy and comprehension born of personal experience. His clothes were of cotton of the cheapest kind, "for food he took nothing but rice and a bowl of soup, and when abroad only cold rice and water." He was a prodigious worker, taking only four hours rest in the night, and sometimes not that. His abode was often an old temple with a leaky roof through which the rain dripped and the wind whistled, to the discomfort of those who gathered to hear his wise admonitions, and when journeying from village to village to investigate the conditions of the people he frequently slept by the wayside to save time, "much to the dismay of his followers."

The story of Sontoku is told in the naïve and entertaining chronicle written by Tomita, his principle disciple, which Mr. Yoshimoto has just translated. The Hōkokuki, as this record is called, is very popular in Japan; it has just been republished by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce in that country, and we would recommend the English version of it to all who care to study what Dr. Carpenter in his admirable Introduction has called "a unique record in the annals of Oriental philanthropy."

SOME RECENT BOOKS ON RELIGION.

Christian Ethics and Modern Thought. By C. F. D'Arcy, D.D. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1s. net.

The Sermon on the Mount and Practical Politics. By A. E. Fletcher. London: Francis Griffiths. 2s. 6d. net.

Through Evolution to the Living God. By J. R. Cohu. Oxford: James Parker. 3s. 6d. net.

BISHOP D'ARCY presents us with a careful and scholarly statement, but in the simple language and manner befitting the series of Anglican Church Handbooks, of which the volume forms a part, of Christian teaching upon human conduct. There is a need of such work, for people often talk in a loose and uninformed way about the large amount of matter supposed to be common to all the leading religions of the world, and it is all too easy to miss the heightening which all the best things in human life get from the Spirit of Christ. No doubt any such effort suffers, in the eyes of most busy people, from the fact that Ecce Homo is a towering achievement in this field that belittles its successors and may seem to render them unnecessary. But Bishop D'Arcy's book may be taken as supplementing that famous work in two ways. It gives attention to questions that can never be long absent from the thoughts of the inquirer into problems of conduct—questions that connect duty with its theological and philosophical grounds. And it tries to envisage and meet the special difficulties of men of the present generation, faced as they are by the large issues of international war and peace, and the labour unrest, and the questions yet unsettled about marriage. Earnest readers will admire the prevailing religious note of the book, and its studied effort after moderation whenever matters are touched which ordinarily arouse passion.

The same subjects are treated by Mr. Fletcher, the former editor of the Daily Chronicle, who writes with a ready pen, and manages to settle most of the world's problems in his little book of eighty-eight pages. There is no doubt about his zeal and his conviction here strongly expressed as to the "practicability" of the Sermon on the Mount. His arraignment of the inconsistencies and failures of our modern civilisation is one that will continue to be made until the European peoples, including ourselves, set themselves more resolutely to the interpretation of the Christian teaching in terms of social construction. But Mr. Fletcher has nothing new to say to us on that head.

It is instructive to turn from these attempts to grapple with practical issues, and look at another effort to popularise a great subject. The Rector of Aston Clinton is already a prolific author, and the present volume shows that he has done a respectable amount of scientific reading in preparation for the task of reconciling Religion with Evolution. He believes that Evolution, read as a whole, clearly points to a Power behind Nature Who is Good. With much lucidity of exposition and fertile power of illustration he goes over the well-worn paths, where those who are beginning to think about the subject could not do better than take him for a guide. It is true that the storm centre of the controversy both in science and philosophy has moved on from the field which Mr. Cohu surveys. But there are many who have not yet perceived this, and the book may be at once a present help to them and a preparation for further tasks of inquiry. They will find here no blinking of difficulties, and a thoroughly manful welcome to the bracing winds of Modernism.

THE CHRISTIAN INTERPRETATION OF LIFE.

The Shining Hour. By F. W. Macdonald. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1s. 6d. net.

NOTHING indicates so clearly the great advance Liberal Christianity has made as its marked but unconscious presence in writers who admit no breach in their allegiance to the old dogmatic. This volume of essays by Mr. F. W. Macdonald is a good example of this tendency. His book is presumably addressed to orthodox dissenters, but there is hardly any emphasis on what used to be considered "the marrow of the Gospel." Save for the inclusion of a paragraph or two in the penultimate essay on "The New Testament View of Jesus," we should hardly have guessed the orthodoxy of the author. The omission of any large emphasis on the old scheme of salvation is all the more remarkable when, as one essay shows, Mr. Macdonald is alive to the growing alienation of the modern world from organised Christianity. Facing the issue he impresses on his readers, not the acceptance of any doctrinal propositions, as a former generation would have done, but the claims of Christ's spiritual message. "Christ," he declares, "has given us a new interpretation of life. . . . He has brought into the world new ideals and motives, new inspirations for conduct, new visions to light our path and new strength with which to follow him" (pp. 86, 87). All excellently stated, but it will carry Mr. Macdonald much further than he is prepared to go, judging from this volume. Resolutely applied it would reveal a deeper and truer reason for the alienation of the modern world than love of pleasure (p. 82).

In an earlier paragraph he comes in sight of the real explanation, when he observes "the moral issue is in all cases the final one: and all moral issues are by their very nature spiritual issues that bring us face to face with God." One can imagine what Ruskin or Tolstoy would have made of such an admission. It is the wide divergence between the profound Christian ideal of life and the pagan practice of our civilisation that will account for so much unbelief. We are reminded of Mr. Peile's hard saying in his Bampton Lectures, that "mankind for centuries has done everything with the moral rule of the Gospel except obey it." Tolstoy made this discovery for himself, and with conspicuous courage proceeded to convert his own conduct and that of others to Christ's plain teaching. In a timid way Mr. Macdonald recognises the existence of this challenge in the Gospels. He remarks: "the Presence of Christ in the modern world is the central and supreme fact. . . . The great issue to be determined is whether human society will accept his government and guidance or refuse them. The issue trembles in the balance to-day." No one whose eyes are open to the facts can feel that Mr. Macdonald has understated the gravity of the issue.

MESSRS. SMITH ELDER & Co. announce that they will have ready on March 28 the Epistles of St. Paul, an English text prepared by Sir Edward Clark, K.C. It consists of the Authorised Version, amended by the adoption of such of the alterations made in the Revised Version as are necessary for correcting material mistranslations or making the meaning clear; but no word will be found in it which is not sanctioned by the Authorised or Revised Version.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

HUGH LATIMER.

1490-1555.

II.

LATIMER, who, as we saw last week, had been sent to take charge of a country parish in Wiltshire, now became very much noticed as a preacher. He always said something that people could understand and take hold of, and he was never a bit afraid of speaking out about anything that he thought wrong. Once he was speaking at St. Paul's Cross in London and a number of Bishops were listening. "I will ask you a strange question," he cried out all of a sudden. "Who is the most diligent prelate (i.e., priest) in all England, that passeth the rest in doing his business? I will tell you! It is the devil! Therefore, you un-preaching priests" (he called them this, because they would not preach to the people in English) "learn of the devil to be diligent in your office; if you will not learn of God and good men, for shame learn of the devil." These were severe words, but it is very likely that some of the priests deserved them, as from all we can hear they seem to have been an idle, lazy set. But sermons of this kind made Latimer enemies, and he was summoned again before the Court of Bishops, and things might have gone badly with him if the King had not stepped in to save him. Then there came a change in affairs—the Reformation, which means the turning of England from Catholic to Protestant, was going on all this while. A man called Thomas Cromwell, who favoured the Protestants, was the King's Prime Minister, and the monasteries were going to be looked into and closed or improved, so that Latimer was now thought better of, and he was made Bishop of Worcester, where he was just as busy as he had been in his little country parish, seeing that all the parishes under his charge had good priests to look after them, and preaching everywhere in his own bishopric. But in a few years' time another change came; people began to think that the Reformation was going too far. The Government sent out a list of articles of belief which must be signed by everybody. These articles were again meant to uphold the Catholic beliefs. Latimer would not sign them, and gave up his bishopric. The King was angry with him this time, and though he would not have him persecuted, still he would not let him go free, so he was kept in prison for a year or so. He was then set at liberty, but the Catholics were always on the watch to do him harm, and they seized him and imprisoned him in the Tower when he came up to London to see a doctor. However, when King Edward VI. came to the throne, he released him again, and he lived for a time in Lambeth Palace, and spent his time in preaching, and in studying, and in doing kind things for the poor. He was so well known for doing kindnesses that he could not walk in the garden without someone coming to beg him for help or advice. It would have been a pleasant end to Latimer's hard-working life if he had been allowed to live on for the rest of his days in this beautiful old palace, but it was not to be so.

King Edward VI. only reigned six years (he died when he was almost a boy) and then Queen Mary, Henry VIII.'s daughter, began to reign, and things went very badly with the Protestants. For Mary was a strong Catholic, and thought it her duty to persecute the Protestants until there should not be one left in England. Only six weeks after she came to the throne Latimer and Cranmer and others of the Reformers were sent to prison. Latimer was already old and often ill, and in his prison he was allowed no fire, though the hard winter was there. But even so he kept up his cheerful spirit and made a sort of joke of it. "Tell your master," he said to the gaoler, "that if he does not look to me better, I shall perhaps escape him." The Governor of the prison was very angry and asked him what he meant. "Why, truly," he said, "you look that I should be burnt, but as it is, I am more likely to be starved with cold." After a while he was moved to Oxford, and kept in the common prison there for over a year. They pretended to give him a trial, but he knew it was no use arguing with them, and, besides, he was too weak and ill to do so. So he only said that he was determined to keep to what he had always preached, and when they sentenced him to be burnt to death all he said was: "I thank God most heartily that He hath prolonged my life to the end that I may glorify Him by this kind of death."

They did not want him to die at once, however. They kept him and Ridley, another preacher, a younger man than Latimer, in prison for a year and a half longer, and tried all they could to make them recant—that is to say, change their minds and become Catholics. But it was no use, and so at last, on October 16, 1555, Latimer and Ridley were led out of the prison at Oxford to be burnt to death. At the open space beyond Balliol College, where they were to die, they knelt down and prayed together, then they took off their outer clothes and gave little remembrances to their friends, and then they were ready. Some friend mercifully tied a bag of gunpowder round the neck of each of them that they might die quickly, and then they were chained to a post and the fire was brought. Latimer's last words were to his friend Ridley, to encourage and cheer him. "Play the man, Master Ridley," he said, as the fire began to crackle. "We shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as I trust shall never be put out." Then as the flames rose up, he bathed his hands in them, until they reached the powder, when he died.

What do you think he meant by "the candle" that they would light by their deaths? He meant that they would give other people light and courage to stand by the truth and to do right whatever it might lead to. This is what makes a great man—to have courage to do what is right in spite of any trouble and pain that it may bring to ourselves, in spite even of death, if it should lead to that. Latimer was a martyr, one who dies for the truth, and there is no nobler thing than that. There have been many of these martyrs in England, both men and women, and it should make us very proud of our country-people when we read about them. It is people of this kind who are great, and who have made England a great country, and not the people who think first of all about getting on themselves and outwitting their neighbours and making a little more money than somebody else. No, it is those who stick to what is right and care more for that than for anything else in the world that are the really great people, although they may never be heard of in history, and may live in poor cottages and have to work hard for their living every day. Latimer had to die for his faith; it is very unlikely that we shall ever have to die for ours, but we can all live for what is right, and good, and true, and that is just as important.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

MANCHESTER DISTRICT
ASSOCIATION OF PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN CHURCHES.

Annual Meeting.

THE annual meeting of the above Association took place on Saturday, March 16. A service was held in Cross-street Chapel, at 3.30 p.m., conducted by the Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, B.A., Principal Mellone preached the sermon from the closing words of Matthew xxiv. 6, "The end is not yet." After service tea was provided in the Lower Mosley-street Schools. The evening meeting was held subsequently in the Memorial Hall at 6 p.m., the President, the Rev. N. Anderton, being in the chair. In his opening words the chairman made reference to the coal strike and the labour unrest of recent years. In the past they had had individuals standing up for the right, if need be, against society. They had been silenced by imprisonment or martyrdom. Now we had masses of the people rising up to protest against the conditions under which they lived, masses whom they would have to answer, not by prison but by justice. Something was needed besides legislation for the new time, if men and women were to live together in unity. That something was what the churches were trying to supply, the inner discipline and the inner obedience. They were told that the present crisis was a challenge to the churches. It was a challenge also to politicians, social reformers, party men, business men—to all citizens. The churches were asked to take sides. There was room, no doubt, for diversity of opinion on this question, but his personal conviction was that it was impossible for the churches as churches to take sides. Their doors must be open to all comers, rich and poor, masters and workmen. The church had to bring together in worship men who might be opposed to each other in the world outside. It must make them feel the high ideals of brotherhood and service. The members of the churches out in the world must take sides. It was theirs to stand as citizens for justice, righteousness, brotherhood, for all that made for the uplifting of the nation. After commenting adversely on some references to Unitarianism made by Dean Welldon, while at the same time paying a tribute to the Dean for his splendid work in Manchester, the President proceeded to appeal directly to all who were present for increased effort and devotion to the churches of which they were members. They were among the few who had to bear the brunt of the work in that district. They believed in their faith. It was their gospel that the power of God was able to save humanity. Could they, notwithstanding all they had done, do more than they had done? They must, while not trusting less in themselves, trust more in God. They must have a mission to their own churches, to their own enrolled members, to awaken them to the duties and responsibilities of their faith, and to revive the spiritual life of their whole community.

The annual report and financial statement were taken as read and adopted.

The Rev. Charles Peach next moved, and Dr. Mellone seconded, the following resolution:—"That this annual meeting of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches appeals to His Majesty's Government for larger grants to the National Exchequer to the Local Education Authorities, and affirms the undesirability of conceding the Right of Entry." The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. Charles Hawksley then gave an address as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of which he is president. After some references to the annual report, Mr. Hawksley said that stress was sometimes laid on the desirability of having one church. One church, he thought, would be a mistake. Minds were differently constituted. The kind of religion suited to one church would not satisfy many others. If they were all like-minded there would be stagnation. Diversity of opinion kept them alive. They might agree on principles. They would nevertheless each desire their own expression of those principles. Above all they must be tolerant one towards another. Proceeding, he gave some account of the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and in conclusion bade them God speed in their efforts in the Manchester district.

The Rev. E. D. Priestly Evans, of Bury, brought a cheerful note of confidence and success from the north and East Lancashire churches. They were full of vigour and life, and did not complain of lack of numbers. They were not chilled by small attendances at worship. As an instance of the healthy condition of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission he would mention their Jubilee Fund, started in 1909. They had raised already £1,500, and hoped to make it into £2,000 before closing the Fund.

Mr. J. W. Barlow, of Bury, directed attention to the importance of taking in hand the young people of our churches and Sunday schools. It was necessary that they should be built up now in character if we were to have sane and sound heads of families, and citizens not marred in their youth.

The Rev. Henry Chelley, of Pendleton, was the last speaker. He was not there, he said, to be heard, but seen. He was the last member baptized into the Unitarian family; last, therefore least! They might have too much speech-making. God had not ordained that his people should be saved by dialectics. He was not there to add to the Book of Lamentations. Unitarians were the lineal descendants of the Stoics. They existed in a frigid zone of eclecticism. But in his view their business was to save souls. If they could not make bad men good men and good men better men, then it was time to sound a retreat. Perhaps they were too cold. They must get nearer to the fire of life. If was not much use telling the world they were Unitarians. They might as well tell people they were Hungarians. The world wanted to know whether they were alive. They wanted more enthusiasm and more earnestness. They must get rid of all apathy and catch the spirit of devotion, of utter faithfulness to God.

The report is a record of hard work under a good deal of discouragement, owing to straitened finances. The income falls far short of the expenditure, and hitherto the balance has been made good out of a reserve fund which is being rapidly exhausted. The committee point out the need of much more generous support if the work in the poorer churches is not to be curtailed very seriously.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

Annual Meeting.

THERE was a good attendance in the pleasant little meeting-room of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth to celebrate the annual meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association on Saturday afternoon, March 16, and the proceedings were marked by cheerfulness and enthusiasm.

The Rev. C. Craddock gave a hesitating glance in the pessimistic direction when he offered a perplexed interrogation concerning the general exodus from churches and the disintegration of the older authority. "We do not find that these people come to us in any large numbers," he said; "yet one would think we had something to offer them." But the meeting refused to consider numerical riddles, and preferred to dwell on the vitality of the claims and contentions of the Association. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes saw in the present state of religious thought not chaos, but a kind of intellectual convulsion in which the atoms would presently crystallise round new centres; and in that process of crystallisation it might be conceived that they themselves would bear their part. Dr. S. A. Mellor, whom the Association welcomed to Warrington, deprecated any dwelling on numbers as a criterion of the spiritual significance of their churches. They lived not by counting heads, whether few or many, but by their assertion of and emphasis on personal religion, on the mystic claims and desires of the souls of men. For him the ministry of such a church was profoundly worth while. The Rev. S. H. Street declared the very existence of their churches as centres of liberal religious faith was in itself a challenge and a witness—a witness of spirituality and a challenge to free and fearless religious thought. Their influence was great, directly or indirectly.

The Rev. J. C. Odgers, who presided, sketched the events of the year, which has been a memorable one, as celebrating the jubilee of the Association. They should congratulate themselves, he said, on the recent legal decision confirming to them the legacy of the late Mr. L. W. Evans, on which the Association will enter into possession in 1914. Mr. Lawrence Hall and Mr. A. S. Thew moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

The Rev. H. W. Hawkes testified to the increasing spiritual activity and sense of fellowship of the church at West Kirby. Bootle deserves congratulation on its loyal endeavour to maintain interest and enthusiasm during its interregnum, and in this regard the noteworthy leadership of its secretary, Mr. Lewis W. Lewis, should be mentioned. The advent of the Rev. Walter Short in July is being anticipated with pleasure and confidence.

The work of the Rev. J. B. Higham at St. Helens is making good progress, and there is a very vigorous Sunday-school. Crewe is looking forward to the settlement there of the Rev. G. Pegler after its long period without a minister. The Rev. S. H. Street gave some interesting and hopeful particulars of his work at Garston. The Rev. A. E. Parry, though his church at Wallasey is now independent of the Association, showed that the religious efforts in that locality are increasingly successful.

Mrs. H. D. Roberts, proposing in the absence of Mr. Roberts the appointment of the members of Council for the year, paid a tribute to the energy and acumen of the hon. secretary, Mr. B. P. Burroughs. The members of the General Council are:—Miss E. C. Abraham, Miss H. Johnson, Messrs. B. P. Burroughs, T. R. Cook, A. Cooper, L. Hall, J. Coventry, L. D. Holt, R. D. Holt, M.P., C. E. Hudson, C. S. Jones, and A. S. Thew.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of this Society was held on Monday afternoon, the 11th inst., at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham. This year, owing to the forthcoming National Conference meetings in Birmingham, the proceedings were somewhat curtailed, the usual conference being omitted. Notwithstanding this fact there was a large attendance of ministers, delegates, and members of the constituent congregations. The report was adopted on the motion of the retiring president, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, who struck a note of cheerful optimism. He laid special stress on the freedom which characterised the churches forming the Midland Christian Union, and appealed for a spirit of unity and determined energy amongst the rank and file, and also made a plea for increased financial assistance, as the Priestley Fund was being depleted, though not at so rapid a rate as was originally expected. Mr. Kenrick pointed to the two exceedingly bright features of the report, the opening of the new church at Wolverhampton and the extraordinary increase of members at Small Heath under its new minister. The president was re-elected on the motion of the Rev. J. W. Austin, who congratulated him on the happy issue of his arduous labours for Wolverhampton. The vice-presidents were also re-elected and gratifying mention was made of the fact that the Rev. Joseph Wood was still to be a vice-president, thus retaining his long and valued connection with the Society, despite his regretted severance of the pastoral tie with the Old Meeting Church, and his probable change of residence from Birmingham. The co-secretaries, Mr. E. Ellis Townley and the Rev. A. H. Shelley, and the retiring committee were also re-elected. Tea was subsequently provided by the Old Meeting Church. At the evening service the preacher was the Rev. E. W. Lewis, of the King's Weigh House Church, London.

WOMEN AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

THE annual business meeting of the Women's Local Government Society took place at Caxton Hall, on Friday, March 15, Mrs. W. N. Shaw presiding, in the place of Lady Strachey. Delegates from twenty-three of the affiliated bodies attended, including representatives of the Yorkshire Ladies' Council and the Irish Women's Suffrage and Local Government Association; also from sixty to seventy subscribers. The annual report, which had been previously accessible, was taken as read. The Lady Emmott moved the adoption of the report, which was seconded by Mrs. Brownlow, supported by Lady Strachey and Mrs. Nott Bower, and carried. The officers were re-elected, and the following ladies and gentlemen were added to the Council:—Lord Henry Cavendish Bentinck, M.P., Dr. Collingridge, M.O.H. (City of London), Mrs. Creighton, Frank Debenham, Esq., J.P., Mrs. Arnold Forster, Mrs. Arnold Glover, Lady Gomme, Miss McKee, Miss Harrison (Dublin), and Mrs. Fabian Ware. On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Miss Cons, who was warmly greeted, a resolution was adopted representing the urgency of the need for the Local Government Qualification Bill. This and other matters having been dealt with, the following was moved by Miss Maitland and seconded by Miss Kilgour: "That, with a view to increasing the share of women in the administration of local government, a women's 'approved society' for England, under the National Insurance Act, be formed as a separate section of the Women's Local Government Society, financially independent." After discussion, the matter was referred to the Committee for further consideration that they might prepare draft proposals to lay before another general meeting, to be summoned for the purpose.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, March 9, the president, the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, presiding. There was a good attendance of members. Miss Withall, as treasurer, presented the Society's balance-sheets. On the general account there was a small balance in hand for the first time for many years. The Southend Home account showed payments amounting to over £123, and the Country Holiday Fund to over £121. Both accounts also showed small balances in hand.

The Committee's report was then presented by the secretary, Mr. R. Asquith Wooding. It chronicled a year of steady progress. Chief among the matters of interest recorded was a teaching demonstration of the Archibald system given by Miss May Pelton, of the Sunday School Union, with the result that two schools had taken up the system for their infant classes. In connection with the report of the Southend Home special stress was laid on the fact that to meet the cry for increased accommodation the Society had taken a larger house, which would enable twelve instead of only seven guests to be received at a time. A considerable amount of new furniture had been bought, and an appeal had been issued for the money required, amounting to about £60. Dealing with the Country Holiday Movement the report stated that 412 scholars had been assisted in the past summer, an increase of 30 over the figure of the previous year.

Mr. Charlesworth, in moving the adoption of the report, especially drew attention to the money required for the Southend Home, and expressed the hope that it would be forthcoming in a short time.

Mr. Herbert Gimson was elected president for 1912, and the other officers were re-elected.

After an interval for tea a public meeting was held. The Secretary gave a short statement on the effect of the National Insurance Act in relation to Sunday-school Provident or Friendly Societies. This was followed by a conference on "The need for further organisation in the Sunday school," introduced by the Rev. Charles Roper. A good discussion followed.

THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

TRAINING FOR SOCIAL WORK.

THE Woodbrooke Settlement, of which Dr. Rendel Harris is head, arranged in 1908 (in conjunction with Birmingham University) a most admirably conceived course of training for social work, to meet the urgent demand for social secretaries, welfare workers in factories, workers in guilds of help, labour exchanges, care and after-care committees, and numerous other forms of effort, both public and private, for the general weal. "There is an ever-deepening conviction," says the most recent prospectus, "that for those who wish to play any effective part in Social Reform, a previous course of training is as necessary as it is in the case of those who are preparing for the medical service or missionary work. Sympathy alone is not enough—knowledge is required as well—and an increasing number of people, who have heard the call to Social Service, feel acutely how ill they are equipped for such work. As instances of this, we may mention the student who, having finished his course at the university, feels keenly the need of coming more directly into contact with social problems; the man of business who is anxious to understand better the social problems which confront him in his own business, or to take up work as an elected or co-opted member of some local governing body, or to give talks to adult schools, or week-end schools, on the social message of Christianity; or the woman who is called upon to live at home, but feels the need of a period of training to enable her to take up one of the many branches of social work for which the voluntary worker is so much in demand. Last, but not least, in importance, comes the case of the man or woman who is desirous of taking up social work as a career, if a reasonable prospect of livelihood offers itself, and for whom a thorough training is absolutely essential."

* * *

The last point is worthy of attention, for while we do not think that the man who undertook social work merely as a means of getting a living—and we are perfectly aware that the Woodbrooke Settlement would be the last place in the world to encourage any such wish—would be of much utility as a public servant, yet, on the other hand, one must pay one's bills punctually at the recognised intervals, and as the average man must produce all that he consumes, one cannot take up social work as a permanent occupation without a reasonable certainty of tenure and the prospect of at least a modest competence.

* * *

Where the authorities of the Settlement have shown a wise instinct is in their insistence that the course shall include definite practical work. In a former—and we hope rapidly disappearing age—there was often a great gulf fixed between the man of thought and the man of action in the social field. The latter was often a well-intentioned mortal, full of zeal and not infrequently empty of knowledge, who distributed the doles of the well-to-do, who perhaps would have resented his having ideas about the root causes of poverty. The man of thought excogitated in his study social and economic theories which had no validity on this planet. Every thoughtful person must now realise that if we are to solve our social problems we must have a constant supply of helpers who can both think and work, and whose thought and work will be all the better for acting in combination.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MISS A. LEIGH BROWNE writes to us to say that the address of the Rev. C. Fleming Williams, hon. secretary of the Free Church League for Woman Suffrage, which was advertised in our columns last week, is 2, Holmbury View, Springfield, Clapton, N.E.

THE annual business meeting of the National Education Association will be held on Thursday, March 28, at 3 o'clock, at the Westminster Palace Hotel. At 4 o'clock a debate on "The Present Condition of Educational Finance" will be opened by Sir George Kenrick (chairman of the Birmingham Education Committee), Lord Sheffield being in the chair.

It is a pleasure to be able to announce that the Rev. E. Daplyn, an able contributor to our own columns, has been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature.

PROFESSOR HENRI BERGSON has accepted an invitation to deliver the Essex Hall Lecture in Whit week.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Atherton.—A sale of work, which has just been held at Chowbent Chapel in aid of the Mission Jubilee Fund, and to defray the cost of chapel repairs, has resulted in £605 being realised, £100 more than was anticipated.

British League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women.—On Wednesday afternoon, March 20, about seventy delegates and members from various branches attended the Council meeting of the League, to hear reports of the work done during the winter. The meeting was held in the Council Room at Essex Hall, and Mrs. Blake Odgers presided. Miss Helen Brooke Herford gave a short survey of the general work undertaken by the committee, and announced the appointment of a delegate from the "Verein für religiöse Unterricht," who would come from Cologne to attend the annual meeting of the League in Whit-week. The International section is evidently developing in a most encouraging way. Many new branches are joining also in our own country. Miss Mitchell explained the work of the Fellowship section, which tries to keep in touch with those Unitarians who have to live away from congenial church fellowship. She read extracts from letters she had received from such women expressing their delight at being offered the chance of becoming Fellowship members and the help they gained from the sense of comradeship through joining the League. Mrs. Herbert Smith appealed to branch secretaries to help in finding hospitality for Whit-week for ministers and delegates, and Mrs. Sydney Martineau gave a cheerful account of the finances of the League. Then followed short accounts from delegates of several of the branches represented. One lady had a specially warm welcome, as she came all the way from Ilminster, and reported well of that branch. Mrs. Davies, of Wakefield, gave an address on "The Intellectual Advance of Women, and the opportunity of the League."

Burnley: Trafalgar-street Church.—The Rev. W. J. Piggott wishes to acknowledge gratefully the help which he has received as a result of his appeal on behalf of the extension fund for improving the Sunday school, and increasing the missionary work of a struggling church in a large industrial centre, especially among the children. The hon. treasurer has received and gratefully acknowledged £29 5s. of the £50 required. The establishment of a primary department and the equipment of the band of hope and string band absorbed over £26 of this, and it has been found impossible to found a gymnasium for young men and women owing to lack of funds. If this scheme is to be carried out before the beginning of next winter, from £12 to £15 will be needed, however economically it is managed. There is also a real need of such useful accessories in the Sunday school as blackboards, easels, maps, models, &c. These, if they have to be purchased new, would cost at least £10. Further subscriptions will be gladly received by Mr. John T. Bibby, hon. treasurer, 3, Western-avenue, Burnley, or by the Rev. W. J. Piggott, 103, Albion-street, Burnley.

Lancaster.—The Rev. J. Channing Pollard was invited to attend the meetings of the conference of the Lancashire Congregational Union recently held at Lancaster, at which 450 delegates were present. At the luncheon on the last day he proposed the toast, "The prosperity of the Lancashire Congregational Union."

Liverpool.—At the spring meeting of the British League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women, Miss Brooke Herford attended and explained various aspects of the work of the League. Mrs. Pearson, Miss Wellmer, Mrs. Roberts, Mrs. Rose, and others, joined in the discussion which followed.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—A reunion of old Sunday scholars and teachers took place on Saturday, March 16, the date having been changed from the first week in the New Year in order to avoid clashing with other social gatherings. A special effort had been made to draw together as many scattered friends as possible, and some seventy old scholars and teachers attended. Short encouraging speeches were made by the minister, the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, a former minister. It is hoped that as a direct result of this meeting an "Old Scholars' Association" may be formed.

London: Stratford.—The annual meeting of the Stratford Unitarian Church was held on Wednesday, March 6. The chair was taken by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, who was supported by the Revs. John Ellis, W. H. Rose, A. H. Biggs, M.A., LL.B., Messrs. A. Savage Cooper, Stanley P. Penwarden, and others. The meeting was well attended. The reports of the church and institutions and balance-sheets for the past year were submitted and passed, and gave evidence of a great deal of vigorous and successful work.

Morecambe.—A course of three week-evening lectures on Unitarianism was recently given under the auspices of the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association, assisted by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. On February 21 the lecturer was the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley, who took for his subject "The Prophets and their Interpretation." On February 28 the Rev. C. Travers, of Preston, lectured on "Was the death of Jesus an Atonement?" The Rev. J. C. Pollard occupied the chair on the first, and Mr. J. Hartley, B.A., of Lancaster, on the second occasion. On March 6 the Rev. J. C. Pollard lectured on "Some main differences between Unitarianism and Orthodoxy."

New Zealand: Wellington.—Judging from the last calendar which has reached us of the Unitarian Free Church, Wellington, the congregation were preparing to give the Rev. W. and Mrs. Wooding an enthusiastic welcome on the occasion of their visit. It was announced that Mr. Wooding would preach on February 25, at the morning service, on "The Great Hazard," and in the evening on "Christianity a Revelation of the Human Self." On February 27 he was to give a lecture on "The Religious Changes I have Seen." During the week a congregational "At Home" was given in honour of the visitors, and the women of the church were invited to meet Mrs. Wooding two days later to hear an address from her on "Woman's Work in English Unitarian Churches." Mr. Wooding was also announced to preach on March 3, and the programme was completed on March 5 by a lecture on "Reminiscences of Life in an English Village."

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Tuesday, March 19, Mrs. W. H. Manning delivered a lecture on "A Dash through Canada" at the Church of the Divine Unity to an audience of 180 people. The lecture dealt with an eight weeks' tour, and was illustrated by 100 slides lent by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Mrs. Manning, in an able and vivacious way, described her impressions of the leading cities, the prairie and mountain scenery, and the agricultural districts, and spoke of the church life and moral tone of the Canadians, dwelling particularly on the strong feeling against intemperance. During the evening she conveyed to the members of the church the greetings of Mr. and Mrs. Gunn, who were formerly members of the Newcastle church, and who started the movement which resulted in the foundation of a church at Victoria, B.C. The chairman, Mr. Otto Levin, J.P., asked Mrs. Manning to send a message of goodwill from those present to their old friends. The proceeds of the lecture, over £12, will be devoted to the church decoration fund.

Newcastle-under-Lyne.—A successful sale of work was held on Thursday, March 14, in the Old Meeting House, Miss Trigger, the Mayoress of Newcastle, performing the opening ceremony. As a result of this effort on the part of the congregation a good sum has been realised.

Norwich: Octagon Chapel.—During the past month a series of five public meetings have been held in the Martineau Hall, following upon the usual evening service, which have attracted considerable attention. Under the general title of "Problems of Citizenship," various speakers accepted the invitation to deal with different aspects of the social question. The opening lecture was given by Mr. W. E. Hansell on "Citizenship and Social Service." Mr. W. H. Jewson dealt the following week with "The Problem of the Working-Class Boy," and subsequent lectures on "Citizenship and Sacrifice," "Citizenship and the Poor Law," and "The Evolution of the Citizen" were given by Mr. W. E. Keefe, Mr. Fred Henderson, and the Rev. Mortimer Rowe respectively.

Sheffield: Unitarian and Free Christian Sunday School Union.—At the annual meeting of the Sunday School Union, which was held in Channing Hall on Tuesday, March 12, Mr. George Vickers was elected President, Mr. S. E. Deeley Vice-President, and Mr. H. Smith Secretary and Treasurer. The following summary of returns from the six schools in the Union was presented. For the year ending December 31, 1911, there are in the Union 764 scholars and 91 teachers. This is four scholars more and four teachers less than last year. There are 263 scholars above sixteen years of age, an increase of 49 on last year. Most of the schools report an increased average attendance, and all report good and improved conditions. It was decided, in view of the recent developments in the district, to add the words "Free Christian" to the name of the Union, and that the secretary should write and invite the Sunday schools of the two new churches at Mexbro' and Bolton-on-Dearne to join the Union.

Warrington.—A crowded and enthusiastic meeting was held on Monday, March 18, to welcome the Rev. Dr. Stanley A. Mellor to the ministry of Cairo-street Chapel. Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P., was in the chair, and the speakers included Mr. J. Rymer Young, J.P., who spoke for the congregation; Mr. David Plinston (superintendent of the Sunday school), the Rev. W. Miller (Presbyterian minister of Warrington), the Rev. E. Stanley Russell (representing the Liverpool District), the Rev. W. Whitaker (representing the Manchester District), the Rev. W. H. Drummond and Mr. Cocker (Rotherham). Dr. Mellor replied to the various greetings in an earnest speech. A cordial letter of good wishes and regret at his inability to be present was received from the Rev. John Yonge, who recently completed fifty years as minister of Wycliffe Congregational Church.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—The last ordinary meeting of this club for the current session was held at Unity Church, Dewsbury, on Saturday afternoon, March 16. The chair was taken by the president, Mr. F. G. Jackson, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Leeds, read a paper on "The Church and Speculative Theology."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A SOCIETY FOR AIDING DRIVERS AND HORSES.

There are still many people who prefer horse-drawn vehicles to motor-cars, and it will be pleasant news to them that a society, under the title of the Horses' and Drivers' Aid Committee, has been started. This society proposes to act on behalf of the cab horse and driver alike by endeavouring to secure better conditions for both, so long as the mixed traffic of motor and horse-drawn vehicles continues, and it is part of their scheme to put on the streets a few small Victorias of the kind in use in Paris for those who like leisurely driving better than being whirled along in the popular "taxi." In employing drivers, preference will be given, other things being equal, to those whose age prevents them taking up new work as motor drivers without interfering with their efficiency as drivers of horse-drawn cabs. Where horses are found to be old, diseased, and unfit for work, the Committee will, where possible, acquire them, and, if necessary, have them mercifully killed; but such horses as may be suffering only from want of proper treatment will be tended and cared for, and then returned to work under the Committee's auspices for the rest of their life. Subscriptions or donations may be sent to Lady Tenterden at 83a, Chester-square, S.W., or to the hon. secretary, Mr. Charles Reinhardt, M.D.

THE SIMPLE LIFE IN LONDON.

The Simple Life Exhibition which is to be held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on March 26, 27, 28 and 29, should attract all who are interested in the question of food reform and the pursuit of health along humanitarian lines. Practical advice on this subject may be obtained at the Exhibition, where demonstrations will be given of the nutritive and economic advantages of meals graded to suit all. Short lectures will be delivered by Miss E. Douglas Hume, Captain Walter Carey, R.N., Mr. Harry de Pass, and Mrs. Hodgkinson, late editor of the British Health Review, which is now incorporated with the Herald of the Golden Age. Complimentary tickets of admission can be obtained on application to the hon. secretary of the Order of the Golden Age, 153, 155, Brompton-road, S.W.

A DICKENS EXHIBITION.

It was a happy idea to mark the Dickens centenary year by arranging a temporary exhibition of relics in the shape of MSS., diaries, portraits and letters at the Victoria and Albert Museum, where the Forster Bequest is already housed. The Exhibition, which is to be kept open until October, seems to represent every phase of Dickens' activities, and includes photographs of many of the buildings and localities mentioned in his works, as well as a large number of original sketches by Cruikshank. The MSS. of most of the novels are shown, and particular interest attaches to the copy of "Edwin Drood," open at the last page, which was written on the day he died. There is also an autograph draft by Dickens of a letter to George Cruikshank which disposes of the idea that "Oliver Twist" was written round certain etchings he chanced to see in Cruikshank's studio. In it he asks him to design afresh the last plate for "Oliver Twist," adding: "I feel confident you know me too well to be hurt by this inquiry, and, with equal confidence in you, I have lost no time in preferring it." The original drawing, in pencil, and the substituted illustration are both on view at the Exhibition.

TEACHING ITALIAN NAVVIES ENGLISH.

The Manchester Guardian records a practical piece of philanthropy in the form of a night school for Italian navvies in New York, where lessons on English are given from a text-book containing actual sentences and instructions which the immigrant is likely to hear while he is doing his work. It has been found that the navy who studies one of the "readers" prepared for children soon learns to interpret such sentences as "The bird sings in the tree," or "see the kitten play with the ball," but he is quite unable to understand the orders addressed to him in the course of the day. Many lives, it is said, have been lost through such phrases as "Look out!" "heads up!" "go back!" or "don't touch the rope!" not being comprehended. The compiler of the text-book found the material she required by spending two days in watching one of the foremen and jotting down every order he gave.

TWO WOMEN PIONEERS.

The death occurred on February 13 of Miss Mabel Sharman Crawford, a courageous upholder of just causes. Miss Sharman Crawford signed the first memorial for legislation to render women eligible to county councils, which was presented to Lord Salisbury on May 20, 1889, just four days after Lady Sandhurst was deprived of her seat on the London County Council on the ground of sex. Miss Sharman Crawford was a member of the Committee from 1893 to 1905. On March 6, 1912, Miss Ellen Robinson, most widely known as an active member of the Peace Society, died at Liverpool. Her long participation in all manner of humane purposes in Liverpool did not prevent her rejection at the ballot when she stood in 1907 for the City Council. She then became a member of the Board of Guardians, and it was while resting on a couch on her return from a meeting of the Board that she quietly expired.

THE NEW CAMPANILE OF ST. MARK'S.

It has taken nearly ten years to rebuild the famous campanile of St. Mark's, Venice, but the work is now practically completed and the opening ceremony will take place on April 25, St. Mark's Day. The statue of the archangel on the pinnacle crowning the campanile is a massive figure of brass, with head, arms and feet of bronze, holding a golden lily which measures 5 feet 9 inches in length.

A YIDDISH THEATRE IN THE EAST END.

The new Feinmann Yiddish Theatre in Whitechapel, which was opened by Sir Francis Montefiore this week, is a standing testimony to the enthusiasm for art and the drama of the Jews in the East End. The cost of building it has been met by contributions of shillings and pennies from the poorer inhabitants of the district, and the enterprise appears to owe nothing to the influence and generosity of the wealthier members of the Jewish community. The theatre has been named after Sigmund Feinmann, the actor, who did so much to preserve the literary qualities of the Yiddish language, but it is also called ambitiously "The Temple of Art." A very enthusiastic audience attended on the first night, when a new opera—written and composed by Mr. Alman, a Russian composer, who is now organist and choirmaster of the Great Synagogue, was produced. The music is said to be surprisingly good, and the performance all round deserving of high praise. A play by Mr. Zangwill, and works like "Rigoletto" and "Faust" are already being rehearsed.

THE EXCHANGE OF PULPITS.

The Ecclesiastical Law Amendment Bill, which has been presented by Sir David Brynmor Jones, is designed to abolish certain restrictions in regard to admitting people of mature age who have not been confirmed, or who have married a deceased wife's sister, to Holy Communion in the Church of England. It also authorises the use of the Burial Service in the case of persons dying unbaptised, or who have committed suicide, and renders the use of the Athanasian Creed optional. In addition to this it would make it possible for clergymen of the Church of England to preach in Nonconformist chapels, and for Nonconformist ministers to preach or minister in cathedrals and churches of the Church of England.

SELF-GOVERNING COLONIES OF BOYS AND GIRLS.

A scheme is on foot to form a society which will undertake the establishment of an experimental colony for boys and girls in this country on the lines of the famous George Junior Republic in America. Mr. Harold Large, who has just returned from a tour of investigation in the United States, is full of enthusiasm about the project, and explained to a Daily News representative a few days ago that he saw no reason why the plan which has proved so successful in America should not work equally well in England. The extraordinary thing about it is that the boys and girls who develop most rapidly and benefit most by the training they receive in the "republic" are those very incorrigibles who are the despair of parents and the State. Freedom and opportunity are provided by a system of control which even goes so far as to maintain police courts in which the magistrate is a boy or girl with power, received from the community of young people, to sentence his or her fellows to terms of detention in a prison where the jailers are boys or girls. Mr. Large frankly admits that the formalist will find more to criticise in a junior republic than anywhere else in the world, but he maintains that these very flaws are the things that help, and that even the formalist will be astonished and thrilled by the wonderful order maintained, and the extraordinary power wielded over the community by the elected boy or girl.

THE BROWNING CENTENARY.

Mr. Robert Barrett Browning has consented to be the President of the Robert Browning Settlement for the ensuing twelve months. He held the same office in the year of the 100th anniversary of Mrs. Browning's birth. A meeting to celebrate the centenary of Robert Browning will be held on May 7 under the auspices of the Academic Committee of the Royal Society of Literature, when Sir Arthur Pinero will give an address on "Robert Browning as a Dramatist," and Mr. Henry James on "The Ring and the Book."

NEW EXCAVATIONS IN POMPEII.

According to the Tribuna, the new excavations at Pompeii have resulted in such extensive finds that the life of the "Street of Abundance" can be almost entirely reconstructed. The principal discovery is that of a huge "thermopolion," a kind of public-house at which hot drinks were sold. This is in a state of perfect preservation, and an exact idea can now be obtained of a Roman place of refreshment. There has been found a row of wine-jars so placed that it would seem the vintner was in the act of pouring wine from one into the other when overtaken by death in A.D. 79. There was also an hermetically closed cauldron still containing water.

GERMANY AND THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

Herr Franziskus Hahnel, the distinguished temperance advocate, of Bremen, now of Leipzig, has supplied the National Advocate, of New York, with a copy of the letter of the Ministry of the State of Lippe to Dr. Kraut, of Hamburg, stating that: "After inquiry from the authorities concerned, and with the gracious consent of his Highness the Prince, the Pollard system is to be used in this country experimentally, in suitable cases, in such a way that convicted persons, who are drunkards, especially if their offence was committed while they were intoxicated, are to have the prospect of having the whole punishment remitted on the condition that during a certain period they abstain from alcohol altogether, and during such period commit no further offences. In carrying out this measure the Ministry of State relies upon the co-operation of the Blue Cross Associations and Good Templar lodges which exist in this country." Public opinion in Germany is evidently being awakened to the value of a crusade against alcoholism.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

We all approach the Easter holidays this year in a chastened mood. The anxiety and suffering which are felt everywhere make hilarity and light-heartedness impossible. Perhaps it will be easier on this account for us to dwell with real seriousness of purpose upon some things, to which we often pay only a conventional homage. The great days of the Christian Year are capable of much finer use than many of us make of them in connection with the facts which they commemorate. When Good Friday is kept as a true fast of the soul and Easter Day as the festival of divine victory and illumination, men win thereby a sense of closer fellowship with Jesus Christ, strength and moral insight for their own conflicts, and the secret of an unconquerable hope.

* * *

It is anticipated that before these Notes are in the hands of our readers the Bill ensuring a minimum wage to miners will have received the Royal assent. Meanwhile its effect as an instrument of peace is very uncertain. With the refusal of the Government to insert any figures in the Bill the situation has again hardened, and everything depends upon the result of the ballot among the miners which will not be known before the middle of next week. The cooler heads among the trade unionists regard the Bill as an important concession of the principle for which the miners have been contending, and if their advice is followed it will be accepted and used and work will be resumed.

THERE has been a sharp division of feeling in regard to the wisdom of the Government in declining to insert the much-talked-of 5s. and 2s. in their Bill. The objection was not to the figures themselves, which are regarded generally as reasonable and moderate, but to the far-reaching consequences of the principle involved. It would certainly have been a leap in the dark in industrial legislation, which many people were prepared to justify on the principle of salus populi suprema lex. The Prime Minister, being convinced that it would be disastrous in its effects, stood firm; and even with those who were opposed to him he will have gained greatly in moral authority by his refusal to resort to panic legislation.

The Times, which has shown an admirable temper throughout the dark days of the crisis, is evidently deeply impressed by the quiet orderliness of the strikers. "The really surprising thing," it confessed on Wednesday, "about the coal strike so far is the admirable order that has prevailed. Some of the miners have broken agreements, but they have not broken contracts. They gave the legal notice to leave work, and such breaches of order as have hitherto occurred have been trifling. In its effects and possibilities the coal strike is a far greater menace to the public welfare than anything that happened last year, but in regard to respect for the established order of things it is rather curiously distinguished from other recent manifestations of the same profound and extensive social perturbation. Those who have watched it coming and have warned the public can only be thankful that it has hitherto so consistently exhibited that character." If this is true, and we think no fair-minded man will gainsay it, it is of good augury for the future. It means that there are reserves of character and seriousness of purpose in our industrial unrest. For ourselves we have never doubted it. Mr. Stephen Walsh was not speaking for himself alone, when he said in the House of Commons on Tuesday, "Our citizenship ought to be higher than our Trade Unionism, and with me it will be."

THE word Syndicalism has suddenly sprung into public notice, and like many other words of foreign origin, which are only imperfectly understood, it has become a bogey, full of vague terrors, for the timid mind. In an admirable article in the Manchester Guardian on Monday, Mr. Lowes Dickinson places it in its proper perspective. "Syndicalism really is," he points out, "what Socialism in general is not, a revolutionary movement. It is French in origin, and has all the violent idealism of the French. For that very reason it is unlikely to have much influence over our prosaic and practical working-class. It is Latin of the Latins, imaginative, reckless, irrational, and anti-rational." He goes on to argue that Syndicalism can only become a force in a society that has lost faith in itself, that has too little knowledge, too little capacity, too little comprehension and sympathy to solve its social problem by common action. "If employers in this country really want to stem the Syndicalist propaganda, they must do better than denounce it and call for troops. They must capture it. And they must capture it by freely and frankly associating labour both with the management and with the profits of their enterprises. This is no easy task, but with goodwill and patience it could be achieved."

THE action of the Government in prosecuting the editor and printers of the Syndicalist for publishing an "Open Letter to British Soldiers," urging them not to shoot men on strike, and the severe punishment which has been meted out to them, have caused a good deal of comment and searching of heart. There is a feeling that it was a concession to public nervousness rather than a stern and necessary repression of a public danger. Liberty for the expression of opinion in the press is a right which Englishmen do well to guard very jealously. It is suppressed opinion which is always most likely to fester into lawlessness, while the dignity of a prosecution is its best advertisement. This view of the case was expressed admirably in a letter, which appeared in The Times on Wednesday, signed, among others, by Canon Barnett, Mr. John Masefield, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, the Hon. Bertrand Russell, and Mr. G. M. Trevelyan. They point out that the proceedings against the Syndicalist were taken under an Act of 1797, under which there has been no prosecution since 1804, that many who completely disagree with this new and obscure newspaper feel themselves compelled to stand up at its side for the right of free speech, and finally that these methods of State prosecution will certainly embitter the social strife "which it is the object of all of us to keep within peaceful channels."

* * *

THE first annual meeting of the British section of "The Associated Councils of Churches in the British and German Empires for Fostering Friendly Relations between the two Peoples" was held in London last Monday, the Archbishop of Canterbury being in the chair. It was reported that over 6,000 ministers from all denominations in the United Kingdom have joined the British Council. The main objects are defined as follows:—"The maintenance of brotherly relations and intercourse between the British and German peoples and the inculcation in both countries of the Christian precept of 'goodwill amongst men.' The new organisation will direct its efforts to impressing upon the people of both nations such considerations as will tend to bring them together as friends and lead them to realise the real duties and interests they have in common. It will attempt to develop sentiments of international patience and forbearance and to allay those fears and suspicions which are continually endangering the friendly relationships that should subsist between different nations."

At Monday's meeting Dr. Spiecker and Professor Adolf Deissman, of Berlin, attended as a deputation, and Professor Harnack sent a letter of greeting in which he said, "Let us bury what lies behind us and look to what lies in front of us. I have no doubt that after all the efforts that have been made suspicion and distrust will now gradually vanish." Professor Deissman spoke strongly of the need of a clear political understanding which would forward the vital interests of both countries. "We Germans wish for political friendship, not with a weak and submissive England, but with a strong England. A weak England would endanger the peace of the world, and in the present state of civilisation a weak Germany would equally imperil the world's peace." He pointed out that the fact that in Germany directly or indirectly nearly every person was connected with the military organisation was in itself a strong guarantee of peace. The personal interests of all classes of the people impelled their statesmen to avoid every attempt at a policy of incendiarism.

* * *

THE last of the Rev. J. M. Thompson's course of lectures on "Miracles and the Christian Faith" was, in his absence, read by Canon Henson in St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Wednesday. He declared unhesitatingly that in the interest of religion itself criticism and the study of religious psychology must go on unhindered. Any attempt to limit free inquiry, either by a critical theory which put certain historical facts above historical proof or disproof, or by a theory of Church discipline which penalised those whose free inquiries did not arrive at certain conclusions, must inevitably widen the already serious breach between the Church and the nation. We lived in an age that grew more and more impatient of those who dogmatised to it. It wanted above all to stand with Christ, and with reason on its side. But if it could not have reason it would not very long stand with Christ. The time was coming when the Church would have to choose between two courses—either to save its life or to lose it—to save it at the cost of becoming an interesting and beautiful survival, or to lose it in giving birth to the national religion of the future.

* * *

THE Rev. J. H. Harris arrived home last Saturday after a journey of some 5,000 miles in Central Africa, undertaken on behalf of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines' Protection Society. On the Congo question he expressed himself as still deeply dissatisfied, though he gladly admitted that the Belgian Government have practically succeeded in putting a stop to the brutalities which roused the conscience of Europe. His verdict on the general situation is as follows:—"In spite of all the fair promises made at the Berlin Conference, the tribes of the Congo basin remain to-day the most impoverished and the most oppressed of any political division of the continent. Their indigenous system of land tenure, their tribal institutions, and indeed their whole social fabric have been ruthlessly destroyed, and so far there has been no serious attempt at reconstruction. I am, however, hopeful that Belgium will soon decide to make the financial sacrifices necessary to placing the administration upon a basis which will meet treaty obligations and raise the Belgian colonial standard to the level of other African Powers."

THE FAILURE OF THE CROSS.

THE Cross is the symbol of victory, but it is also the badge of failure, and not merely of failure inflicted by a hostile power, but of failure accepted in loyalty to God. The Gospels reveal the depth of the disciples' dismay when they saw all their exultant hopes crushed into the dust. With the reticence due to the deepest mysteries of life they also hint at the agonising sense of failure which must have pierced the heart of JESUS CHRIST like a sword as he suffered and died. Christendom has dwelt so long and so fondly on his physical agony, the scourging, the cruel nails, the parching thirst, the bitter pains of death, that we often fail to look beneath these things to the suffering of the soul, so much harder to bear, through which sacrifice wins its redemptive power. We may suffer in a spirit of rebellion against our fate, many men have done so; but the heart cannot crush its dearest hopes, postpone its most cherished dreams to some dim and illimitable future, and deliberately choose failure instead of the succouring help of twelve legions of angels, except in the power of a love capable of choosing and accepting its own defeat as the price of faithfulness to the Will of God. This truth which was crowned on Calvary meets us in another form in the strange imagery of the story of the Temptation, with its piercing insight into the deeper motives of our Lord's life and purpose. One compromising word of prudent accommodation to the spirit of the world, and the kingdom might have been within his grasp. But to every thought of this kind, and who shall tell how often it assailed him in moods of divine impatience with the wickedness or stupidity of men, there was the one answer, "Get thee hence, Satan!" And in that word there is already implicit the final tragedy of failure.

Accepted failure is only one of the lessons of the Cross, and to some blunt minds little accustomed to the fineness and delicacy of the highest spiritual motives it may seem paradoxical or even absurd; but the disciple who has discovered its truth for himself in hours of inward wrestling and taken it with him into his own moral campaigns in the world will never regard it in that light. Christianity would be far less universal than it is if it did not concern itself with the guidance of the converted as well as the rescue of the lost, and reserve some of its sternest warnings for the man of good intentions. For the one thing which the man of good intentions often refuses to recognise is the possibility that the world may gain more by his failure than his success. He is confident in his own power to succeed and to choose prudently. He is irritated and amazed at the slowness and folly of other people. He is impatient to usher in the millennium in his own way. He will do something startling and dramatic, and why should he be too scrupulous about his weapons if only they defeat the enemies of God. This is one of the special dangers of the enthusiast and the crusader at a time when new forces are fermenting in society and there is a rising spirit of protest against traditional errors and ancient wrongs. But the impatience which is not too nice in its selection of methods, so long as it gets things done, is often too self-willed to have much fellowship with the deep purposes of God. It forgets that the condition of all noble human service is willing co-operation in a work of love and righteousness too vast for the individual life. As we stand in the presence of the Cross and its lesson of accepted failure is flashed into the heart, we realise in a new and deeper way the wonder of our divine calling, that always and by all means we are to be fellow workers with God, to whom a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is past and as a watch in the night.

In this, however, there might be more of the calm and collected strength of the Stoic creed than of the Christian's joy in believing, were it not for something else. The failure is the victory of love, and because it is that it is a principle of union among men and sets up the kingdom of goodness in their midst. There have been many martyrdoms in the world, alas! that it should be so, which are lonely and ineffective. As we look back upon them they seem like a waste of sacrificial pain. They sprang rather from some strange flaw of intellect or obstinacy of temper than from any finer spiritual vision for the race. They moved few hearts and won no disciples, and to the end of time they will remain shrouded in a mystery of fruitless regret. But the Cross was not of this kind. Its very loneliness had in it the secret of the deepest social healing. It kindled undying sympathies and common purposes of good in the hearts of men, and created out of the depths of its own sacrifice the Christian fellowship of one heart and one mind. The feelings with which we celebrate the sad memorials of the Passion this year, amid grave national anxieties, the apparent drifting apart into embittered antagonism of different sections of society and the surging up of strange volcanic forces beneath our feet, should quicken us all spiritually to a deeper realisation of the oneness of humanity in God and of the unifying power of common sympathies which spring out of the very heart of trouble. The failure of the Cross as it emerges into the light of victory is the defeat of pessimism, and it can still inspire the splendid confidence that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

ENGLAND'S LAST MARTYR FOR RELIGION.

It is a little surprising that, up to the present, so little attention has been called to the fact that the closing week of the current month marks the tercentenary of an event of considerable national importance and interest. The occasion ought to be worthily celebrated by all Unitarians as a matter of course, and with equal propriety by all for whom freedom of thought and liberty of conscience are privileges unstated by custom and by the habitude of modern enlightenment. For it is exactly three hundred years ago that England's last martyr for conscience' sake was burned at the stake for maintaining anti-Trinitarian doctrines. It was then that Edward Wightman suffered within the precincts of the ancient cathedral city of Lichfield.

It was in his death, in his two-fold execution, that Wightman was associated with Lichfield; in life he belonged to Burton-on-Trent. At Burton Wightman attended periodic conferences of Puritan divines, who foregathered to discuss matters of Christian doctrine and exegesis, and it was at these meetings that he first promulgated those devious doctrines that were destined to cost him his life amid circumstances as dramatic as they were unprecedented in the whole history of martyrdom at the stake. His brethren were far from pleased with Wightman's unorthodoxy, and tried in vain to bring him into what they believed to be a more reasonable frame of mind. Then Wightman himself precipitated a crisis. King James the First visited the little township of Royston, and Wightman thrust into the hands of that royal pedant a petition in which he claimed toleration for the articles of his own particular creed. The sequel may best be told by reproducing a letter written twenty-eight years after by Richard Neile, Archbishop of York, to Sir Dudley Carleton. The original is preserved in the Public Records Office (Domestic State Papers, Vol. 432, No. 27, IV.). In the following transcript the spelling has been modernised throughout:—

"I received your letters of the 3rd August, signifying the pleasure of the Council that I should certify to their Lordships the proceeding held with the blasphemous heretic, Wightman, who was burnt at Lichfield when I was bishop there. I desire to understand from you on what particulars the Lords require to be certified. For the generality of my proceedings with him, the Archbishop of Canterbury [Laud], can inform them, as he was with me and assisted me in all the proceedings against Wightman from the beginning to the end. . . . It may please you to understand that this Wightman discovered himself by a petition, delivered at Royston to my then Master, King James, who, finding that he was of my diocese, sent him to me to my dwelling, then at Westminster, with command to commit him to the Gatehouse, and to take examination of his several opinions under his own hand; which I did, using many conferences with him by myself, and by other learned divines, to make him see his blasphemous heresies and to reclaim him. This course of conference was held with him from about a week after Easter till the middle of October [1611], in all of which time no good could be wrought upon him, but he became every day more and more obstinate in his blasphemous heresies. Whereupon the King commanded me to send him down to Lichfield, and myself to go after him, there to proceed against him as a blasphemous heretic. At my coming to Lichfield, being there assisted by sundry divines of very good note, we began with him by divers days conference, but to no purpose. Then we proceeded in a legal way against him in the Consistory."

Leaving now for a moment the Archbishop's letter, let us examine the various counts in Wightman's indictment, which is also preserved in the Public Records Office; and we shall find that these fall into two categories. Those of the first class charge him with maintaining certain doctrines, which, though unorthodox, were quite consistent with his sanity; in those of the second class, he is charged with entertaining certain blasphemous opinions regarding his own personality, opinions which to-day would be recognised immediately as being typical of mental derangement.

As regards the first, he was accused of (1) Denying the Trinity of Persons in the Unity of the Deity; (2) denying the divinity of Christ; (3) denying the doctrine of the Immaculate conception; (4) affirming that the three creeds, the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian were the heresies of the Nicolaitanes; (5) that the baptism of infants was "an abominable custom," and that the use of baptism should be administered with water only to converts of sufficient age and understanding, converted from infidelity to the faith.

In the second category we find him possessed by the following unhappy delusions. He had, it was alleged, declared that "he, the said Edward Wightman, is that prophet spoken of in the 18th of Deuteronomy in these words, 'I will raise them up a prophet, &c'; and that that place (i.e., text in modern usage) of Isaiah, 'I alone have trodden the winepress,' and that place 'whose fan is in his hand,' are proper and personal to him, the said Edward Wightman; and that he, the said Wightman, is that person of the Holy Ghost, spoken of in the Holy Scriptures, and the Comforter, spoken of in the 16th of St. John's Gospel; and that that place, the 4th of Malachi, of 'Elias to come,' is likewise meant of his person."

Having made ourselves acquainted with the indictment, we may now return to the narrative of Archbishop Neile:—

"After sundry days passed in a legal manner of proceeding, and after three assignations for sentence, we appointed a day for sentence, which we executed in the body of the church, and, before the sentence was denounced, myself began the business with a sermon, and a confutation of his blasphemies against the Trinity of Persons in the Eternal Godhead. To all which he no way relenting, but persisting in his blasphemies, I read the sentence against him, and denounced him to be a blasphemous heretic, and to be accordingly certified to the secular power. Whereupon his Majesty's writ was directed to the Sheriff of the County of the City of Lichfield to burn him as a heretic."

The present writer has been fortunate enough to come across in the Public Records Office the identical writ to which reference is here made [Domestic State Papers: Signs Manual, Vol. II. No. 14]. The following is a translation of the original document:—

"THE KING to the Sheriff of our City of Lichfield, Greeting.

"Whereas the reverend father in Christ, Richard, by Divine Providence, Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield has reported to us that he, proceeding judicially according to the requirements of ecclesiastical canons and of the laws and customs of this our Kingdom of England, against one Edward Wightman, of the Parish of Burton-on-Trent, in the diocese of Coventry and Lichfield, of and upon the wicked heresies of Ebion, Cerinthus, Valentinian, Arius, Macedonius, Simon Magus, of Manes, the Manichees, Photinus, and of the Anabaptists, and other arch-heretics; and furthermore of other cursed opinions, spawned forth by the instigation of Satan, and heretofore unheard of, the aforesaid Edward Wightman, appearing before the aforesaid reverend father and other divines, publicly, knowingly, stubbornly, persistently, and in malice and hardness of heart, defended and disseminated the aforesaid wicked crimes, heresies, and other detestable blasphemies; by the final sentence of the said reverend father, &c. . . . the said Edward Wightman stands condemned and pronounced a heretic, and therefore it has been decreed that he, like some diseased sheep, shall be cast out and cut off from the flock of the Lord, lest he infect our subjects by his contagion. And whereas the Holy Mother Church is powerless to do or execute anything further in this matter, the same reverend father has left the same Edward Wightman to our secular power, to be punished with well-merited punishment as a blasphemous and condemned heretic. We therefore, as a zealous promoter of justice and defender of the Catholic Faith, desirous to defend the rights and liberties of Holy Church and the Catholic Faith, and to uproot and extirpate all such errors and heresies, and all such heretics so convicted and considering that a convicted and condemned heretic of the aforesaid character ought, according to the laws and customs of this our kingdom of England usually enforced in these matters, to be burned with fire; do command thee that thou cause the said Edward Wightman, being in thy custody, to be committed to the fire in some public and open place within the city aforesaid, for the reason aforesaid, and before the people, and cause the same Edward Wightman really to be burned in the said fire, in detestation of the said crime, and as a manifest example to other Christians, that they may not fall into the same crime. And this you are in no wise to omit, under the peril that shall follow thereon. Witness, &c.

"Given at Westminster on the ninth day of March, 1611." [This would, of course, be 1612 in modern notation, as the year at that time ended on March 31. Hence the tercentenary.]

For the extraordinary and sensational sequel we must again turn to the letter of Archbishop Neile:—

"Upon [receipt of] the writ, he being brought to the stake, and the fire [having] scorched him a little, he cried out that he would recant. The people thereupon ran into the fire and suffered themselves to be scorched to save him. There was then [there ?] prepared a form of recantation, and offered to him, which he then read and professed before he was unchained from the stake. Hereupon he was carried back to the prison, and after a fortnight's time, or three weeks, he was brought into the Consistory [the period that elapsed was sixteen days], there to declare his recantation, and to renounce his blasphemous heresies in a legal way, that the same might remain apud acta in the court, done deliberately upon better resolution and in truth, and not upon terror of the fire. When he came into the Consistory he blasphemed more audaciously than before. His Majesty, being informed of this his behaviour, commanded the writ for the burning of him to be renewed, which was sent down and executed, and he died blaspheming."

"Cawood Castle, 9th August, 1639."

It is highly probable that the sympathetic attitude of the Lichfield populace on Wightman's first appearance at the stake had no small influence on the subsequent policy of the King, and may account for Wightman having been England's last martyr for religion.

FRANCIS KET.

In connection with the Tercentenary of the Unitarian Martyrs, the following extract from an old book of sermons by a Puritan divine may be of interest. William Burton was a good man, and himself suffered persecution for his Puritanism. Both he and his victim were University men, Burton of New College, Oxford, Ket of Corpus Christi, Cambridge, and the latter was, in addition, grandson of Kett of the Rebellion of 1549. Psychologically, both of them are a very curious study, the martyr for his fantastic beliefs about Jerusalem, and the Puritan divine for his strange interpretation of God's feelings towards a heretic.

"David's Evidenc, or The Assurance of God's Loue."

By William Burton,
Preacher at Reading.
(Lon. 1596.)

(6th Sermon, p. 124.)

"I haue knowen som Arrian heretiques, whose life hath bene most strict amongst men, whose tongues haue bene tyred with scripture upon scripture, their knees euen hardened in prayer, and their faces wedded to sadnesse, and their mouthes full of praises to God, while in the meane time, they haue stowly denied the diuinitie of the Sonne of God, and haue not sticked to teare out of the Bible all such places as made against them, such were Hamond, Lewes an Cole, heretikes of wretched memorie lately executed and cut off in Norwich. What shal I say of Frances Ket another Arrian which succeeded them, in opinions more monstrous then his predecessours, for hee helde that whosoener will bee saued, must before hee die, go to Jerusalem; that Christ wyth his Apostles are nowe personally in Judea gathering of his church; that the faithfull should miraculously be preserued at Jerusalem, with a wall of fire, and be fed with Angelles foode from heauen; but these were his dreames, and yet such dreames as (rather then he would forego them, hauing once embraced them) caused him to plunge himselfe ouer head and eares in most damnable and cursed heresies. For behold, to maintaine his former fancies, he held most impudently that Christ is not God, but a good man as others be, and that which was neuer heard before, that Christ hath suffered once for his owne sinnes, and shal (before the end of the world) suffer againe, for the sinnes of the world, and that being done he shal be then made God after his second resurrection. And yet as monstrous as hee was in opinion, see how holy hee would seeme to be in his outward conversation. The sacred Bible almost neuer out of his handes, himselfe always in prayer, his tongue neuer ceased praising of God, when he went to the fire he was clothed in sackcloth, hee went leaping and dauncing: beeing in the fire, aboue twenty times together, clapping his hands, he cried nothing, but blessed bee God, blessed bee God, and so continued untill the fire had consumed all his neather partes, and untill he was stifled with the smoke that he could speake no longer: all which I was a wnesse of my selfe. But shall we thinke that the Lord tooke any delight in the prayers or praises of such a deuill incarnate; farre be it from us. A strange and fearefull example of a desperate, of a hardened, and a cursed creature, and yet not to be wondered at, for the deuill hath his souldiers and martires as well as the Lord, and oftentimes they are more resolute in the deuilles quarrell, then some are in God's quarrell. As for his willing and ready going, with his constant induring, it was no more then is performed by such as hang themselves, or drowne themselves, but what pleasure hath the Lord in the sacrifices of such?"

J. H. M. NOLAN.

WIMBLEDON COMMON.

In these hurrying days of spring, when on every side the urgent tides of life are flooding bud and leaf and the numberless forms miraculous of insects and creatures of the soil, the call of the skylark rising from brown heather into the misty blue, seems specially jubilant. Down in the glen, or on the farther slopes of woodland, we know there are other bird-notes, cheery, brisk, chattering, or tenderly sweet with the blackbird, bold and shrill with the thrush. There, too, are the privacies of this pleasant region, where the foot falls on thick layers of mouldering leaf, and as in the side-chapel of some vast minster a peculiar peace waits the solitary visitor. But up here on the broad plateau is the generous sense of nature's widest communion. Here is assurance, if not yet the perfect possession, of a fulness adequate to the mind's hunger. There is a quality about the skylark's song which is not so much triumphant as something better, an innocent, untroubled delight in life. From one bird to another the spirit of music turns, and each little speckled throat vibrates responsive, while the brave wings mount the breeze and wave after wave of melody rolls along the sunny world. So full, so energetic, are these days. It hardly seems to be weeks ago, surely not months, when wintry silence lay like a calm over all, or at most there was but now and then in the leafless birch-copse a short sudden ripple of sound, unexpected and at once lost again in the stillness, as when upon a sea lying blue and seemingly motionless a single flash of foam smiles on the surface and dies out into the unbroken deep.

Wimbledon Common—there may be other places like it, we speak only as we know—is more than a playground, it is a sanctuary, and not for birds and other of nature's children alone. Here come men and women of tired brain, the wounded spirits, to be healed. Here, of course, unconscious youth, lads and girls from distant elementary schools, children happy in having their homes near, sportive players at one game or another, horsemen and footmen bent on exercise—every variety of child, in short, may be found enjoying in different ways the wealth afforded by these miles of wild and open land. Picture-lovers and picture-makers abound. Students and observers ramble through the tussocks of the boggy valley, pore at the mossy roots of trees, explore the possibilities of gravel-pits, persuade pond and rivulet to yield tribute. Whether it was here or elsewhere, or whether he or another, Linnaeus might have knelt hereabouts, praising God for the sight of the broom in blossom—or was it the gorse? No matter; there are more things guessed than known about our Common, but the things beautifully real still go beyond both guess and knowledge.

It is a great space, a breathing-space, a thinking space. Right away to Leith Hill, Mr. Walter Johnson says, you may see from Cæsar's Camp; and from Leith Hill, the old gossip at the tower declares, you can see the waters of the English Channel. Anyway, the eye can revel in far reaches and the mind in great surmises; the narrow confines of city life are taken away; north, west, south, the landscapes are wide. Up from the distant sea the wind blows freely over the Downs, south and north, over the fields of Sussex and the woods of Surrey, without serious admixture with smoke. What haze is there, usually produces but new graces of subtle colour where earth and sky meet. But above all, in both senses, is this vast dome of sky—dome of a sanctuary certainly of space—in part, at least, of peace.

Mr. Johnson's book* brings to mind a new thought of spaciousness, for with a copious store of information he tells us about those distant ages when the London

Clay was forming and the various overlying gravels and sands were laid. What vast stretches of time have gone to the moulding of this little bit of earth-surface, and this one of the newest!

Then we are told of relics of the earlier men here, paleolithic perhaps, neolithic assuredly. The question of the camp, British or Roman; the ancient tenure of the soil and local applications of the manorial system; the mustering here of armies, the fearsome story of highwaymen, duellist echoes, homes and haunts of famous men and women—all this the author brings for our interest. The humanist may, if he please, stop now, and he will have ample to be thankful for. But Mr. Johnson goes on to tell us something of the wonderful variety of living things, plant and animal, that may be found here. Being a schoolmaster, he places the experience of his craft at our service in an excellent series of suggested walks and studies on the spot, suitable to the various tastes of the observer. Naturally, the book appeals in the first instance to those who live within a visiting radius of the Common; but its illustrations are frequently of use to nature-lovers everywhere, and as a model of what might be done to show us what we are looking at when we step out of doors it will repay a wider attention.

Our guide tries not only to open our eyes but also our ears. Beside describing the plumage of the bird he reports its song. It is a brave endeavour, and for my part I mean to benefit by it—I am sure I shall. And yet, how different is any formula from the living thing! Here, as everywhere in this great world of life, the best that any teacher can do is to help the living to possess its own, to understand its experience and open a way for more. When it is another kind of sanctuary that invites, the record of deep and holy thought, how can I perceive if with my own soul I have not felt—at least sufficiently to know what the prophet is speaking of, or the saint? Well, in this spacious world, let us hope there is room and opportunity for all of us to grow in, as there was room on the Common for the rosy babes in their carriages and the rather queer-looking poet who stopped now and again in his long walks to greet them—them only of all who might steal a glance at that solitary figure so that they might be able to say they had seen Swinburne.

The hurrying spring days suggest alertness to the prudent. But a short while ago the whole region was white with loveliest frost. Soon the woods will be one vast choir of singers, out of which he that is lucky may discern even in the vocal morning the matchless cadences of the nightingale. Those who will, may prefer to listen for those strains at nightfall, but to me there seems a cheerful fellowship in the general chorus. Later in the year the music will lessen as the colours deepen. Flashing wings of wood-pigeon, magpie, and jay will gleam through the foliage, and down among the bracken thickets there will now and then be found the glories of the pheasant. And so the world of life, wonder, beauty, and mystery will revolve about us again.

METHODS OF VIOLENCE.

SIR,—I have till now refrained from writing, but I feel that it has become every woman's duty to stand up for the highest interpretation of Honour and Obedience—Obedience, that is, to those elemental and fundamental laws upon which the very existence of a nation depends.

The reiterated excuse of men's misdeeds and violence seems to me—and I speak for hundreds of other women—the most futile justification for woman's outbreaks. The effect of men's violence passes away and is scarcely remembered; it is natural to the immature male animal to have these episodes. But woman's violence may have, and is indeed bound to have, far reaching and dangerous consequences, to bear a crop from the sowing of dragon's teeth.

The inhabitants, men and women of our great dependencies, more especially of India, are accustomed to regard an Englishwoman as the fine flower of Western civilisation. If she declares boldly that if she cannot have her demands immediately granted violence and destruction of other people's property is right and justified, how can we be surprised if the lesson is only too quickly learnt? Strangely enough, this frenzy of organised violence has cast its spell on ministers of religion.

If it were only that their chivalry was touched by the sight of women sacrificing their liberty and enduring hardship for a cause, then one could quite understand their palliation of the act in admiration of their courage, but they all go farther than this; indeed, they seem to go off the line altogether, and tell us for the first time that Christ himself set an example of violence, and Paul apparently is charged with the same. I confess I feel very indignant at this entirely new departure, and if a mere lay woman may be allowed to speak, I should say this is an utterly unfounded and baseless accusation. Let us not, for heaven's sake, compare the magnificent outburst of Christ against the desecration of the Temple—the only action which can be called violent—with the futile and childish action of the militant women! Do we anywhere read of destruction of property even dimly counselled? Is not violence always deprecated? Had women been prevented from speaking in public, or from gathering together in public, or from marching, &c., then I should be the first to say "break the law." But there has been no justification of this sort. We are accustomed to be amused at the prayers of the old Scotch meenister:

"Give us, O Lord, receptivity—that is, O Lord, the power of receiving impressions."

But I think we could not do better than pray:

SIR,—I am not given to rushing into print, nor have I the slightest intention of entering into a newspaper correspondence, but I feel impelled to write and thank you for the editorial note appended to Mr. Lummis's letter in your issue of the 23rd inst. Quite apart from the rights and wrongs of the suffragist question, I, for one, cannot help regretting that, at a time such as the present, the advocacy of the "principle" of everyone a law unto herself or himself, which, as I read it, underlies the letter, should come from one of our ministers.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE HARVESTING OF A NATION.

The American People: a Study in National Psychology. By A. Maurice Low. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 8s. 6d.

THE second volume of Mr. Maurice Low's brilliant study of "The American People" is a book of absorbing interest. Taking up the story of the New World at the period when the stage was being set for the great drama of the American Revolution, it traces the rapid growth of a nation destined to give an entirely fresh conception of liberty to mankind through all the sensational vicissitudes which have marked its development, and invested it with the glamour of the fabulous that owes nothing, in this case, to immemorial traditions. The chapters dealing with the influence of Puritanism, the gradual loosening of the ties that bound the American colonies to England, the birth of a national consciousness, the framing of the famous Constitution which taught the world the meaning of democracy, and the far-reaching effects of immigration, slavery, and the civil war on morals, manners, political ideals and commercial expansion are full of the raw material of romance which awaits the transmuting touch of some twentieth century Balzac or Dumas. It would not be fair, however, to convey the impression that Mr. Low has merely compiled a chronicle of historical events to which his sympathetic imagination has not already lent the glow and colour which the novelist or dramatist is expected to supply. He writes sanely and impartially, his sole object being to make a statement of truth devoid of racial bias and rhetorical exaggerations; but, at the same time, the note of idealism is not absent, and it is clear that he has caught the contagion of that potent and irresistible force in modern history which no one has yet properly defined—the American spirit. He believes, too, that not only is the story of American progress something new in history, but that it has actually produced a totally new type of character which, while deriving its finest qualities from British ancestry, differs quite as much from the English type as from that of any European nation.

Perhaps the chief value of this book lies in the refutations of popular fallacies with which it abounds, and its original, yet, after all, simple and reasonable explanations of some of the puzzling aspects of American life and thought which are apt to bewilder a superficial observer. Mr. Low is not in bondage to preconceived ideas, and does not allow his patriotism as an Englishman to blind him to the faults of the Mother Country in that troubled period when a little sympathetic comprehension of the aspirations of her subjects might have kept them loyal to her rule. At the same time, he reminds us that there were faults on the other side, and that the Puritan democrat was no enemy to despotism per se—only to the despotism which irritated him, and restricted his freedom. The extreme tolerance and liberality in respect of religion, for instance, which characterised the clauses of the Constitution was really due to the fact that the signatories were all men of such strong conviction and signal determination to uphold their individual dogmas, that the only possible way of satisfying everybody was to leave out God altogether. The question of immigration is dealt with in the same discriminating way, and the conclusions arrived at by a careful and illuminating process of reasoning from authenticated facts ought to reassure those people, both in America and our own country, who believe that the yearly influx of illiterate aliens into the United States is a growing menace to national stability and progress.

We cannot resist a reference to what will probably be regarded as the most challenging and vigorous chapter in a book full of living interest, wherein Mr. Low ruthlessly shatters the popular illusion as to woman's position in America. It contains some astonishing statements, which are sure to be hotly disputed, but they need give no offence to the most ardent feminist, for the writer is plainly on the side of the angels. What he desires to point out is that, up to the present time, in spite of the adulation which she receives, and the wealth which is poured out at her feet, the American woman has never had a fair chance of making her influence truly felt in the affairs of the nation. She neither "rules nor reigns." "In the beginning she was both a luxury and a necessity," and although she toiled with heroic fortitude in those early colonial days, enduring all the hardships of pioneering and contributing every bit as much to the wealth of the nation as the man with whom her fortunes were linked, "no recognition was accorded her . . . the Salic law was not more inexorably enforced among the Franks than it was among the Americans." When prosperity came she had, of course, an easier time, but it ministered to the vanity of the men who had reclaimed the West from the wilderness, spanned the continent with railways, built cities and bridged rivers to install their wives in great houses, load them with jewels, and give them unlimited money to spend on dress. These were the outward and visible signs of wealth and success, and the women-folk were expected to receive them gratefully, without evincing any curiosity "to discover the Pactolian sands." The present mood of woman in America, Mr. Low adds, "her restless, nervous energy, her desire for independence . . . is the revolt against the subordination to which she has been subjected for three hundred years . . . She is tired of inferiority, and is satiated with luxury and pseudo-chivalry. She wants what has never been granted to her. She wants the recognition of intellectual and moral equality."

WILLIAM JAMES.

William James. By Emile Boutroux. Translated by A. and B. Henderson. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 3s. 6d. net.

M. BOUTROUX's little book on William James is clearly inspired by a sincere admiration for the personality of the great American, and is marked also by a thoroughly judicious appreciation of the contribution made by James to philosophical thinking. All that M. Boutroux does is carried out with scrupulous care and nicety of feeling, and it has been a pleasure to read this latest tribute to the Harvard professor whose loss was so keenly felt. From the outset, M. Boutroux grasps what was really the great secret of the influence exercised by James, the intimate connection, namely, between the man and his philosophy; as we ourselves said in these columns some time back, the philosophical thinking of William James was the exact expression of the most inward life of his soul. That is why, as Boutroux points out, his students never found in his lectures "ready-made answers in view of their examinations." But they found what was far more valuable, a noble and beautiful spirit, into the presence of which it was impossible to come without being the better for it. "He had," says Boutroux, "a proud and courageous soul; and this pride was founded upon a simple trust in the injunctions of morality and the generous enthusiasms of religion. He had the instinct for sympathy and love, for sacrifice, for the asceticism which disciplines the will, for the heroism consecrated to the ideal"; this is altogether true, and it was the spirit, so formed, that always shone, with exquisite radiance, through all that James spoke or wrote. Boutroux rightly estimates James's contributions to psychology as of permanent and enduring value; but we cannot be so sure with regard to his more philosophical and metaphysical speculations, though we agree with Boutroux that it was into just these speculations that James threw all that was best and finest in himself. James really left his philosophy incomplete. How could it be otherwise, when that philosophy was the direct result of an inward experience which was itself never at rest, always moving on to something new? The philosophy of James is like the man, "essentially free," going boldly forward "with experience as its only guide," attaining, we have no doubt, "other heights in other lives." We are glad to notice that Boutroux does not fall into the error, which has so often been made, of confounding the real philosophy of James with his pragmatism. His connection with the "Pragmatism" of thinkers like Schiller and Dewey was more that of loyalty to men who thought they were following him than anything else. Pragmatism, for James, as Boutroux rightly urges, was always a method, never a system. The system towards which James, by his pragmatic method, approached, he himself called "Radical Empiricism"; its fundamental principle was that "total immediate experience and truly objective reality are one." You get Reality by living into it, as it is directly given in the fulness and richness of concrete experience, and not by abstracting from that experience and replacing its vitality and full-bloodedness by a dead, logical system. And the power of living is essentially free and creative; the search for Reality, the contact with Reality, becomes a notable adventure in which there is always something new to accomplish and something new to attain. It is easy to see why James hailed Bergson with delight.

We commend heartily M. Boutroux's book to every reader, whether lover of philosophy or not, both for its own sake and for the sake of its theme: all that James said and wrote is worth study, and any tribute that recognises this, and leads anyone to the original again, is sure of a welcome.

THE PROPHECIES OF ISAIAH.

International Critical Commentary. Isaiah i.—xxvii. G. B. Gray, D.D. D.Litt. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 12s. net.

THE great International Critical Commentary steadily advances towards completion, in face of difficulties to which the preface of the present volume bears witness. The Book of Isaiah had originally been assigned to the late Dr. A. B. Davidson; but he died before making any substantial progress with his commentary. To fill his place the editors invited Dr. Buchanan Gray and Dr. A. S. Peake, allotting to the former ch. i.—xxxix. of this book of Isaiah, and to the latter ch. xl.—lxvi. The choice, on the evidence of the present volume, was admirable, and there is equal ground for confidence in regard to the second volume. Part of Dr. Gray's portion is reserved for the second volume, in order to preserve comparative equality in the size of the two books. The present volume contains the general introduction to the prophecies as a whole, and commentary on ch. i.—xxvii. The introduction is the work of Dr. Gray; but he states that Dr. Peake has read it and is in general agreement with it, and in particular with such references as it contains to ch. xl.—lxvi.

Like all the volumes of this Commentary, this one is written mainly for the more or less expert student; and the general reader will not find very much in it that will interest him. But at least the general reader will observe with pleasure that it is written in English, and not in American.

A book of this kind necessarily involves much reference to the work of other scholars, and leaves comparatively little room for the originality of the commentator. But there is much difference between a good commentator and a bad one; and so far as we can judge, Dr. Gray is emphatically a good one. He knows his subject thoroughly, and is not overweighted with it. He knows what he wants to say, and says it clearly without waste of words. Perhaps the most striking point he makes, is the statement that the book of Isaiah as a whole is a post-exilic compilation. It has, of course, long been customary to distinguish between the first Isaiah and the second; in recent years a third has been assumed. But even this distinction did not account for all the problems of authorship presented by the prophecies. There is not, and there has not been, any doubt that genuine prophecies of the original Isaiah are contained in the book in considerable quantity. But there are passages which do not seem to belong to either him or the second or the third chief writer. The theory that the whole book is a post-exilic compilation is intended to account for the inclusion of all these, by saying that the book as it exists now is a collection of prophecies of very different ages, grouped together as being in character Isaianic, whether rightly so considered or not. The collection was made, or completed, perhaps about 150 B.C., and, while there is much in it of the work of the original Isaiah, it is not implied that he himself ever collected his prophecies, still less that he arranged them in their present order. This theory makes the understanding of the book of Isaiah (so called) much less difficult than it was before; and the use that is made of it by Dr. Gray is certainly one of the chief excellences of his commentary.

Detailed criticism of a book which is necessarily itself a mass of detailed criticism is impossible in a brief notice. So far as I can judge, Dr. Gray has given the student just what he needs, and this latest volume of the Commentary should receive as warm a welcome as any of its forerunners.

THE DOCTRINE OF IMMORTALITY IN THE ODES OF SOLOMON. 1s. net. By J. Rendel Harris, M.A.

BOTH the title of this book and the name of its author should win for it a wide circle of readers. Those who cannot, for a variety of reasons, follow the critical discussions of the lately discovered Odes of Solomon can learn briefly something of their intrinsic value, and, above all, appreciate the early Christian doctrine of immortality. Everlasting life is a matter of Christian experience, as the odist conceives it, and he connects it with the life of Christ. "The real question of immortality is in the quality, not in the prolongation of existence. As by many Christian fathers, the future life is regarded as conditional. It is also assumed, if we may so speak, in the present life. Absent from the odes is the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body, the last judgment and eschatology generally." Whether these ideas owe anything to Gnostic speculation or not, we venture to assert that they reveal elements, alike rational and spiritual, which will appeal strongly to modernists wearied of the materialism within and the negations without the churches.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE LOGOS-DOCTRINE IN GREEK AND HEBREW THOUGHT. By the Rev. F. E. Walton, B.D. London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co. 3s.

IN a small volume of a hundred pages it is obviously impossible adequately to discuss eight centuries of speculation on the part of Greek philosophers, Jewish schoolmen, and Christian apostles. But as a brief résumé of the main doctrines of ancient philosophy, and as an attempt to trace the connection between Greek and Hebrew teaching, this little work has merits of its own. Did space permit, some of the questions raised might be answered in another way; as it is, it must suffice to commend Mr. Walton's treatment of a difficult subject to the careful consideration of thoughtful students of religion, ancient and modern.

A BOOK OF THE HOME (Headley Brothers) is the title of a small volume by Mrs. Catherine C. Osler, consisting of addresses delivered by her at different times to various audiences on subjects of profound and perennial interest to all thinking women. Many of our old traditions are being challenged to-day, and many institutions held sacred by our parents are in the melting pot. How often are we told by a prejudiced press that the destruction of the home and family life is going to be one of the dire results of the Socialistic tendencies of our day? But the danger surely lies much more in the direction of the idle and luxurious living of some sections of society with its feverish unrest, its craving for excitement, its incapacity to be anything but bored by the peace and joy of the hearth—"four feet on the fender," the patter of little feet, and the prattle of little tongues.

The best traditions of English family life are portrayed in this little book, and the young home-makers of to-day might be spared many a tear and many a sigh if they made Mrs. Osler their mentor and resolved to carry out her ideas. She does not shirk the real problems of adolescent life. In the chapter headed "Light-houses" she deals trenchantly with the question of purity, and how wise and understanding are her words!

Mrs. Osler writes with clearness and charm, and has a deft turn for quotation, and we are grateful to her for giving these papers a wider publicity. We have read them with great pleasure and still greater profit. What more need be said?

ST. LUKE, EVANGELIST AND HISTORIAN, eleven essays by Herbert McLachlan, M.A., B.D., will be published shortly by Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes, of Manchester. Prof. Peake has written an introduction, in which he says:—"Mr. McLachlan's volume is timely in that it handles topics of living interest to the New Testament student. But my pleasure in commending it is due not simply to this, but . . . to the intrinsic value of the book itself. The appeal is not simply to the textual critic, but to all who would form a just appreciation of the third evangelist. . . The book reveals a comprehensive study of the relevant literature, but it reveals also close first-hand investigation of the subject, and considerable independence of judgment; and I sincerely trust that its reception will be as cordial as its merits deserve."

A REMARKABLE volume of essays on Germany in the Nineteenth Century has just been issued by the Manchester University Press. (Manchester: Sherratt & Hughes. 2s. 6d. net.) Leaving the official world of politics on one side, it is the most important contribution to Anglo-German friendship which has been made for a long time. Sentimental appeals are beginning to lose some of their force. It is sympathy based upon accurate knowledge and a clear understanding of the formative influences in German national life and character, which we chiefly need. This is what this volume provides. Dr. J. Holland Rose writes on the Political History, Professor Herford with all the wealth of his German scholarship on the Intellectual and Literary History, Professor E. C. K. Gonner on the Economic History, Dr. M. E. Sadler on the History of Education, and there is a short introduction by Viscount Haldane.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

NARCISSUS.

ONCE upon a time, there wandered through the wonderland of old Greece a fair youth whose name was Narcissus. He was like an enchanted child, born into an enchanted world; and everywhere he looked it seemed to him that he saw gods. He thought that there were hidden immortals in the blossoms and the breezes, and the leaves and the grass and the air; he caught fleeting glimpses of their garments; he came upon traces of their white feet; he heard faint echoes of their unearthly music in the midst of the common things of earth. When he walked on the seashore, he would turn to

"Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea,

Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn."

When he penetrated the dim aisles of the forest it seemed to him that nymphs peered round the tree trunks, and that dryads made silver laughter among the shiverings of the leaves. When he stood by the river to mark the rush and flow of it, it was to him "garrulous with babble of gods." And wonder was born in the gentle youth—that wonder which his own

Aristotle calls the beginning of the Love of Wisdom. Truly, in all these things, Narcissus was wiser than he knew. And he was beautiful with the beauty of that day and place; bright curls clustered round his head, his cheek was soft as any maiden's, and his eyes were wide and blue.

But a sad fate waited for poor Narcissus. One day he lighted on a sheltered spot where a spring, bubbling and gurgling among green mosses, ran down the tiny channel it had made to form a clear, still pool. Joyously Narcissus stepped down into this mossy dell, flung himself on the flowery bank, and stooped over the pool to drink. But, before his lips met the water, a strange thing happened; for he saw rising swiftly from the green depths of that enchanted pool a lovely face. He gazed in wonder at the face, at its clustering curls, its softly moulded cheek, its wide eyes—and the face gazed up at him. He smiled for very joy at its beauty, and the face smiled back. He spoke, and the lips in the water moved in reply. He stretched out his arms, and it seemed that she moved her arms to his. But when he plunged his hands into the pool that he might reach the face and clasp it, it was gone. Only when all was still except for the gleaming dart of the tiny fishes, and he again leaning over with anxious face, did that other face reappear; and it seemed to wear a look of reproach.

So Narcissus lingered all day and every day besides the clear pool, and looked and longed for the face in the water. He had never dreamed, he thought, of anything so lovely as this goddess of the pool. Through hours of sunshine and cloud and rain he peered into the depths. There was one who loved him, a gentle nymph in the train of Pan, the god of the woods. Her name was Echo; and as he gazed at the face in the pool she would draw timidly near to gaze with wistful eyes at him. As he sighed because he could not reach it, she would answer with a sigh. But he never saw Echo's sad face. He had no eyes except for the phantom face he longed for. And at last the summer faded and the skies were hidden, and Narcissus pined away there and fell sick and died. The gods—so runs the story—pitied this profitless life and death, and caused a sweet flower to spring from his grave. We still call the flower Narcissus. Of course you know what was this face Narcissus saw in the still pool. It was his own face! He thought he was gazing at the goddess of the spring, and all the time it was the reflection of himself. He fell in love with his own beautiful face.

How silly! perhaps you think. And yet, do you know, Narcissus is a picture of a good many persons in these very days—perhaps even of you and me, when we come to think of it. Many persons do just what he did, without his excuse. They pass the days gazing at their own reflections and fall in love with their own faces. I don't mean that they sit in front of a mirror all day, our substitute for his pool. They do a worse thing even than that: wherever they look they just see themselves! The old Greek story is a parable of life; and it acts itself over again when a man or woman, or even a child, spends the days in caring only about self. Such persons are like Narcissus, except (it is a very big except) that, unlike him, they are not beautiful. Narcissus thought he was gazing on a goddess; but the persons we are thinking of do not look for goddesses; they only look for and they only see themselves. So they are always very ugly people—yes, they really are; for to be very selfish is to be very hideous. Did you not know that? Well, don't forget it, for it is quite true.

These persons, too, have a funny language of their own. That is one of the ways by which they may be recognised—their way of speaking. They have one grand favourite amongst all the letters of the alphabet: the letter "I." They are not fair to the personal pronouns, for poor "you," "she," "he," and "they" have no chance with them at all. It is only "mine" and "me" they will notice, and they overwork those dreadfully. All this is very ugly, just as it would be if you never did anything but bang down one note of the piano. People would soon call out to you, "Oh, do stop banging that note!" In just the same way there are some persons to whom other persons long to cry out, "Oh, do stop your 'I,' 'I,' 'I,' and give us a change of pronoun!"

If you ever find yourself beginning to make an idol of "I," think of Narcissus, who died of love for his own face. "I" may not kill you, indeed; but it will certainly kill all beauty in you and spoil all the beauty that can be spoiled around you. Things lovely and of good report shrink away from it. Think of the pity of that!

But there is another story—oh, how much more beautiful!—that I want you to place besides this little fable of poor Narcissus. And this story, thank God, is true. Long years after Narcissus there came another on this strange adventure of life that you and I are engaged in now. This other bore his part in the adventure so wonderfully, so radiantly, so greatly, that ever since men's hearts have woven a poem about him out of their love, their sufferings, their beliefs, their fears, their longings, their penitence, their hope. He played his great part on what seemed quite a small and paltry stage, and yet ever since his life has been like a ladder set between heaven and earth, with angels ascending and descending upon it. That day of Jesus seems to us the greatest moment of earthly time.

Why? Well, I think one great reason was this: that he wielded that most tremendous force in all this world, the force of the soul that completely forgets itself and completely gives itself. "Even Christ pleased not himself." You cannot understand this? No, nor can I. None of us really understands it, for it seems that no one else has ever tried it quite as Jesus did. A few have caught some of his secret and come near him, and they have been wonderful and beautiful too. Like him, they have made the world and the people that touched them more beautiful:

"Within their eyes

The human love lies

Which makes all it gazes on Paradise."

But we ordinary people find it so difficult to get rid of the idea that to please ourselves, to see our own reflections everywhere, is such a very fine thing, even if we do want to please other people as well. Jesus never looked for his own face. That we know. He looked for the face of God everywhere, in the lilies, the fields, the trees, the birds. But most of all he looked for it, and found it, in the faces about him, and it made them lovely to him—all those poor, sinful, sorrowful, bewildered faces crowding about him in those common streets of long ago.

Do you think the story of Narcissus pretty? I do. But perhaps some day you will come to understand that the most beautiful thing that has ever come to pass in this old earth which is our home is just this: that the story of Jesus has been told in it.

The next time you feel that that big greedy self is all that really matters, think of Narcissus who died for love of himself; and then think of that other, of whom it was said so simply, so truly, "Even Christ pleased not himself."

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. THOMAS HARWOOD.

WE regret to announce the sudden death of Mr. Thomas Harwood, of Bolton, which took place last Saturday.

Born in the year 1851, he was the youngest child of Mr. Robert Harwood, of Bolton. His education began under the tuition of Mr. Kay and Mr. Kershaw, and was continued at the Chorlton High School under that of Mr. Kendall. After leaving school he was articled to Messrs. Briggs & Bailey, where the foundation of his future success as a conveyancer was laid. His career as a law student was brilliant and distinguished; at the early age of 21 he secured the Clifford's Inn Prize and passed his final examination, second by order of merit in England. Mr. Harwood was admitted a solicitor in 1872, and for several years practised in Bolton on his own account. In 1876 he formed the firm of Messrs. Hulton & Son (now Hulton, Harwood & Briercliffe).

Mr. Harwood took a useful but unostentatious part in the work of the town; every good movement found in him a willing helper. From 1894 until its dissolution he was a member of the Bolton School Board, and when the Guild of Help was formed he was one of the first to join. But his loss will be most felt by the Bank-street Chapel, to whose service the greatest part of his leisure has been devoted. He was for some time the secretary to the chapel, and in 1868 became a teacher to the school, and later its superintendent. He was one of the trustees of the chapel, and it may safely be said of the majority of the Unitarian chapels in the neighbourhood. He was identified with the North East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, of which society he was for over twenty years the honorary treasurer. This work naturally fitted him for the position of chairman, which he held at the time of his death.

A sketch of Mr. Harwood's life would be incomplete without some reference to his adherence to the cause of temperance, which always enlisted his strongest support. He was for some time on the Committee of the United Kingdom Alliance. The practical interest he took in the movement was further shown by his activity in promoting the welfare of the Manchester Temperance Hotels Company and Bolton Coffee Tavern Company, of which he was the chairman of directors.

It was once said of Mr. Harwood that he was "far too honest to be a successful lawyer," but his life has proved this statement to be a fallacy, and has justified the name of the "honest lawyer" which was often given him. It is by such men as Mr. Harwood that the legal profession is ennobled. Among his brother solicitors he was considered one of Bolton's ablest conveyancers, and his opinion on conveyancing matters was always valued. He was an energetic member of the Bolton Law Society, whose presidency he held in 1896. Mr. Harwood was a broad-minded man, of wide sympathies. No one could be with him without feeling the influence of his rare and kindly nature and encouraged by his genial personality.

Deep sympathy will be felt with his brother and sister, Miss Harwood and the Rev. James Harwood, in their bereavement. The funeral took place on Wednesday. A memorial service was held at Bank-street Chapel, conducted by the Revs. J. H. Weatherall and C. J. Street, and this was followed by cremation in Manchester.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council was held on Tuesday, March 26, at Essex Hall, the President of the Association, Mr. C. Hawksley, being in the chair. There were present Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke, Treasurer, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Miss Burkitt, Mrs. Mace, Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Mr. Titford, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. J. G. Pincock, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Dr. Blake Odgers, Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. E. Capleton, Mr. Harold Wade, the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, W. G. Tarrant, Rudolf Davis, V. D. Davis, C. Roper, W. W. C. Pope, and W. Copeland Bowie (Secretary), Miss E. Sharpe, Miss Tagart, Miss Florence Hill, Mr. A. Wilson, Miss Lister, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Mr. T. Pallister Young, Mr. Delta Evans, Miss Taylor, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding (Missionary Agent). Before proceeding with the ordinary business Mr. Hawksley moved that the respectful sympathy of the Council should be conveyed to the relatives and friends of deceased members, including Mr. David Martineau, Mr. William Haynes, and Mr. Thos. Harwood, of Bolton. Mr. David Martineau was for upwards of 50 years an active member of the committee, and President of the Association in 1879-80. He was devoted to the religious movement with which the Association is identified, and laboured with unswerving loyalty and enthusiasm for the spirit of the principles of Unitarian Christianity. The resolution was passed, all present standing. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie then read the minutes and the report of the Executive Committee. The latter deals with many matters which have already received attention in our columns, and contains some further information of an interesting character which we give below.

HOME MISSIONARY WORK.

At a meeting of the Committee held March 13, grants for the twelve months, April 1, 1912, to March 31, 1913, were made to 67 congregations towards the salaries of ministers, and the expenses of providing occasional preachers where there is no settled minister. The grants ranged from £50 to £5, the total amount voted being £1,660. Special grants for new buildings and repairs to old buildings, amounting in all to £200, have been made to Doncaster, Hinckley, Longsight, Taunton, and Cullompton, and for lectures at Cleckheaton, Colne, and Horsham. The formation of the Sheffield and District Association is a matter of interest, rendered all the more necessary by the support of the newly-formed Free Churches at Bolton-on-Dearne and Mexborough, which have been placed under the care of the Rev. Thomas Anderson, formerly connected with the Congregational body, now the missionary minister of the Sheffield and District Association.

The services at Cambridge have been conducted regularly by the Rev. E. W. Lummis during the University terms, and the attendances and interest have been well sustained. The members of the congregation pay for the hire of the hall and other local expenses, and contribute £20 towards the salary of the minister. The Association finds about £80 in addition, and towards meeting this charge the treasurer would be glad to receive special donations. The services at Cambridge are, in the opinion of the Committee, important, and well worth adequately sustaining.

During December, 1911, the Rev. Dr. Carpenter delivered two lectures on "The Historical Jesus" and "The Theological Christ" at Liverpool, Bolton, and Nottingham. The lectures attracted large and deeply interested audiences at Liverpool and Bolton; at Nottingham the attendances were considerably smaller, but a number of students were present. One week-evening lecture was delivered at Doncaster, and a Sunday evening lecture at Ipswich and at Lewisham. Dr. Carpenter reported that everywhere there was the greatest readiness to hear what he had to say; the keenness and attention of the audiences at Bolton, mostly men, were, he said, very stimulating. He addressed in all about 1,400 people each week.

The Missionary Agent, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, being free from Van Mission duties, has, since the last meeting of the Council, visited a large number of grant-aided and other churches in England and Wales. His reports, summaries of which have appeared in THE INQUIRER and the Christian Life, have proved informing and helpful to the Committee, and they believe that Mr. Spedding's visits are welcomed and appreciated by the various congregations in different parts of the country.

PUBLICATIONS.

It has been customary for several years past for the Association to publish books intended for general circulation, and not merely for missionary and propagandist purposes, with the name of Philip Green upon the title page. As Mr. Green did not wish his name to appear any longer, the Committee decided, after careful consideration, that the imprint "The Lindsey Press" be used on the title page of any special books or other publications instead of "Philip Green," whenever it was considered advisable not to use the imprint of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In adopting this course, the Committee were desirous only of circulating as widely as possible publications upon which the efforts of writers and the money of the Association had been expended. Mr. Ronald P. Jones kindly prepared a special design for the title-page of "The Lindsey Press." It is peculiarly appropriate that the name of Lindsey should be associated with publications issued from the building opened by him for Unitarian services in 1774, and now occupied by the Association.

COLONIAL AND FOREIGN WORK.

The following grants for the year in aid of colonial and foreign work were made at the meeting of the Committee, March 13:—Brussels, £10; Budapest and its affiliated churches, £50; Christiania, £45; Jamaica, new Unitarian movement in charge of the Rev. E. Ethelred Brown at Montego Bay, £50; India, the Khasi Hills Unitarian Mission stations, £75; native Indian student studying at Calcutta, £20; Indian student at Manchester College, Oxford, if appointed, £100; Canada, Unitarian missionary work under the superintendence of the Rev. F. W. Pratt, £250; Wellington, £100.

Interesting reports concerning the progress of the liberal religious movement have been received by the Committee from Brisbane, where the Rev. Douglas Price is minister; Iceland, where Mr. M. Jochumsson continues his varied labours; Italy, where the Rev. G. Conte is engaged in spreading a knowledge of Unitarian thought among his fellow-countrymen; Japan, where the Rev. S. Uchigasaki is tireless in his efforts at Unity Hall; Johannesburg, where the Rev. G. C. Sharpe is working hard to build up and consolidate the religious movement so auspiciously begun by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; Vancouver, where the services of the Rev. M. R. Scott are attracting large and interested congregations.

FINANCE.

Omitting shillings and pence, the receipts for the year ending December 31, 1911, were as follows:—Subscriptions, £2,702; collections, £638; dividends, £1,476; Book Room sales, £724; Book Room grants, £422; Van Mission, £824; special, £50. The payments were:—Home work, £2,332; colonial and foreign work, £1,173; book and tract grants: home £267, colonial and foreign £155; deputations and meetings, £46; Van Mission, £822; book department, £1,036; anniversary expenses, £97; salaries and wages, £860; general expenses, including rent, postages, &c., £235. For the year 1911 there was an excess of expenditure over income of £186. The income of the McQuaker Trust for 1911 was £940, the expenditure £1,068, an excess of £128, which amount was paid out of our accumulated balance from previous years, now rapidly disappearing.

The local treasurers render valuable and helpful service, for which the Committee are grateful. It has been arranged that the Missionary Agent, when not engaged in home missionary or van work, will give special attention to finance, and he will endeavour to assist and encourage the local treasurers in every possible way.

BLASPHEMY LAWS.

The Civil Rights Sub-Committee have had their attention directed to the blasphemy laws still on the Statute Book, including Acts passed in the reigns of Edward VI., Elizabeth, and William III. The Committee are of opinion that the enforcement of these laws is contrary to the spirit of the present age, that prosecutions taken under these laws do harm to the cause of true religion, and that they should be repealed.

Mr. Hawksley moved the adoption of the report, which was passed unanimously. Mr. Bowie briefly alluded to the arrangements which had been made in connection with the anniversary meetings in Whit-week, particulars of which were already in the hands of those present. He added that Mr. Grosvenor Lee had resigned his position as Vice-President, and the Committee have nominated the Rev. Charles Hargrove to fill his place when his resignation takes effect. The report of the Joint Committee re Ministers' Stipends followed, in regard to which questions were asked by Mr. Pinnock, Mr. Pallister Young, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. George Leigh.

Mr. Hawksley, in moving a resolution commemorating the Unitarian martyrs of 1612, said that although at the present time we were not called upon to suffer death for holding opinions which were considered by some heretical, there were still martyrs to the cause of truth whose sufferings were often more prolonged than those who died at the stake, and to them the deepest sympathy should be given. The resolution, which was seconded by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, supported by Dr. Tudor Jones, and passed standing, was as follows:—

"That we, the members of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, regarding with deepest sympathy and veneration the martyrs of every creed and race who in past ages suffered for conscience sake, solemnly and reverently commemorate at this time those pioneers of Unitarian thought who, 300 years ago, were faithful unto death; and, while gratefully acknowledging the advance already made in religious liberty and in charity amid differences of opinion, we commend these examples of heroic constancy to all who yet suffer persecution, and we devoutly pray that the last traces of the spirit of bigotry and intolerance may wholly and speedily disappear from the Christian Church of this and other lands."

Miss Emily Sharpe said she hoped the Committee would see their way to publishing this year a little volume dealing with these martyrdoms, which she thought would be very useful and acceptable both in homes and schools.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL UNITARIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Committee have had before them interesting suggestions from the Rev. C. W. Wendte, D.D., the Secretary of the International Congress, recommending that those closely associated with the Unitarian movement in America, England, and Hungary, should together form a Missionary Society for the spread of the principles and ideals of Unitarians throughout the civilised world. The chief suggestions of Dr. Wendte are as follows:—

(1) Object.—To awaken the Unitarian Churches of America, Great Britain, Hungary, and other countries to a consciousness of their larger missionary duty and opportunity; and unite them in the endeavour to extend and promote Unitarian principles of religious thought and life among the peoples of the world.

(2) Spirit.—Believing that God has never been without a witness in the history of mankind, the Society will recognise and avail itself to the fullest extent of the elements of truth and goodness in every religious faith which it may encounter in its missionary efforts, while steadfastly declaring to men everywhere the transcendent merits and power of a free, spiritual, rational, practical religion.

(3) Methods.—While working in harmony with existing Unitarian organisations, the Society will devote itself more to spreading emancipating ideas and kindling uplifting sentiments than to founding churches; it will seek to promote a spirit of sincerity, reverence, and sympathy; to preserve, as far as possible, in every country its own natural life and institutions, and to impart to them the quickening impulse of noble ideals of faith, hope, and love.

It is proposed that for the present the headquarters of the Society shall be at 25, Beacon-street, Boston, Mass., U.S.A., with branch offices at Essex Hall, London, and Kolozsvár, Hungary.

These proposals were received with much interest, and a short discussion followed. The Rev. Charles Roper ultimately moved that the Executive of the Association be requested to take this matter into its most earnest and sympathetic consideration, and confer with Mr. Wendte. This was seconded by Miss Florence Hill and carried.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

Annual Meeting.

THE vigorous institutional church, with its network of missionary activities, which has its home in Stamford-street Chapel, Blackfriars, S.E., under the leadership of the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, held its annual meeting last Monday, Mr. Charles Hawksley being in the chair. The reports of the minister, the committee and the secretaries of the various clubs and societies were as usual a fine record of self-sacrificing work for the good of men. Mr. Ballantyne lays special stress upon the fact that the common worship on Sunday is the centre from which all the other activities radiate, and it is very satisfactory that he is able to record a spirit of growing earnestness and deepening interest in the services.

"More and more deeply as time goes on," he says, "do I feel the conviction that the definitely religious (I had almost said the evangelical) side of our work makes upon us the most urgent call; that all our institutions and societies, our meetings and social gatherings, must be so many means for stirring up in ourselves—o many avenues by which to convey to those around us, our pure gospel of 'faith in God and faith in man.' That there may be no aimless activity in our midst; that each year should find our many helpers knit more closely together in frank, sincere devotion to the spreading of the Kingdom—this is my deepest hope, and surely the ideal for us all."

The Provident Bank and the Boys' Own Brigade are among the important institutions at Stamford-street. In connection with the former £996 were collected in 1911 against £910 in 1910. The progress of this work is well illustrated by the fact that in 1886 only £8 12s. 7d. was collected. The B.O.B. has again had a most successful year. The report refers specially to the success of the Summer Camp and the United Church Parades. "It is at such gatherings that the B.O.B. movement is seen at its best. And when the young lads, with their opening and deepening minds, meet together under the sacred influence of sincere worship, looking upwards together, for even a short hour, and feeling the call of the ideal Sonship, one keenly feels a sense of the possibilities, the worth, and the importance of such Brigade work in purifying and uplifting the citizenship of our land."

The one unsatisfactory feature in the report is the balance due to the treasurer, which has grown during 1911 from £94 to £127.

The adoption of the various reports was moved by the chairman and seconded by the Rev. W. C. Bowie, and carried unanimously.

On the motion of Mr. John Osborn, a member of the Southwark Board of Guardians, seconded by Mr. N. M. Tayler, the following were appointed the officers and committee for the ensuing year:—Mrs. Midlane, Miss M. A. Mace, Miss L. Martineau, Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Rev. G. C. Cressey, Messrs. A. W. Harris, I. S. Lister, G. Ling, C. F. Pearson, Percy Preston, H. H. Quarumby and J. Welch. Hon treasurer: Mr. W. S. Tayler; hon. secretary, Mr. A. A. Tayler.

Mr. Alfred Wilson proposed and Mrs. Lupton seconded a hearty vote of thanks to the Rev. J. C. and Mrs. Ballantyne and all who had assisted in the work during the past year.

It was moved by Mr. C. F. Pearson, seconded by Mr. Percy Preston, and resolved: "That this meeting, noting that the income of the Institution is insufficient to meet its ordinary expenses and that the buildings are in urgent need of decorative repair, commends the work of the Mission to the liberal religious public, and appeals on its behalf for increased financial support."

The meeting closed with hearty thanks to Mr. Hawksley for taking the chair.

BIRMINGHAM: HURST STREET MISSION.

Annual Meeting.

THE seventy-second annual meeting of friends and subscribers of this Mission was held in the Hurst-street Chapel on Monday, the 25th inst., the Rt. Hon. W. Kenrick presiding. Apologies for non-attendance were received from the Revs. Joseph Wood and Thomas Paxton. The Lord Mayor (Alderman Bowater) wrote expressing his deep regret that this year he would be unable to preside, as he would have liked once more to testify his warm appreciation of the value of Mr. Clarke's labours to the city generally. He hoped that Mr. Clarke's recovery from the accident he had unfortunately met with would soon be complete, and that he and those associated with him in the work of the Mission would receive all the support and sympathy they so well deserved.

The report of the committee was read by the hon. secretary, Mr. C. Johnson, and the financial statement by the treasurer, Mr. Warren Tyndall.

The missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke, then read an exhaustive report giving details relating to the varied and numerous activities of the Mission.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that lengthy as the report was, he could go through it, clause by clause, from beginning to end, and find nothing but that which merited praise and commendation. He had always regarded that Mission as something more than a denominational one, as one whose work covered, and which therefore belonged to, the city generally. It was evident that the Lord Mayor thus regarded it, and further evidence of this was seen in the fact that it had the support of those of widely differing creeds and politics. He had been curious enough to examine the report carefully, and had found that the Mission contributors numbered upwards of 1,400. He heartily congratulated Mr. Clarke on what he considered his splendid record, and hoped that he might long be spared the health and the strength to continue his beneficent labours. The Rev. E. A. Voysey, M.A., seconded the resolution, speaking in highly appreciative terms of the extent and value of the Mission work, of Mr. Clarke's unflinching optimism, of his capacity for overcoming difficulties of every sort, and for winning the confidence and affection of those who shared his labours.

Resolutions appointing officers and committee for the ensuing year, electing the Lord Mayor President, and thanking the Chairman for presiding, were proposed and seconded by the Revs. J. W. Austin, M.A., and Gertrude Von Petzold, M.A., Mr. W. Cheshire and Mr. J. J. Coleman, all of whom expressed their sympathy with and admiration of the work of the Mission, and heartily congratulated Mr. Clarke on having added still another year of successful labour to the quarter of a century's work which had preceded it.

The evening's proceedings were pleasantly varied by an anthem and a part song given in excellent style by the chapel choir; and the meeting, which was in all respects a most successful and encouraging one, was brought to a close by the singing of a hymn, and the pronouncing of the Benediction by Mr. Clarke.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

TRAVELLING FACILITIES.

WE are asked to state that special travelling facilities with reduced fares are being arranged for the convenience of ministers and delegates attending the Birmingham Conference on April 16-19. Particulars and the necessary vouchers can be had on application to the Rev. J. Harwood, 60, Howitt-road, Hampstead, N.W.

Special arrangements apply to those travelling from the North of Ireland. Return tickets will be issued from Belfast at a single fare and one third, available from April 13 to April 22 inclusive. Particulars and the necessary vouchers may be had on application (with a stamped addressed envelope) to the Rev. A. O. Ashworth, Marsdene, Cyprus Park, Belfast.

UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

In connection with the Annual Meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service, there will be held in the lower schoolroom of the Church of the Messiah an Exhibition of Social Need and Social Service. It is designed as a survey of the work awaiting men and women in the service of the nation, and particularly of the nation's poor.

The exhibit is divided into four courts—(1) Physical need and the promotion of health. (2) Industrial need and industrial betterment. (3) Social and charitable work. (4) Social study.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Birmingham: Moseley.—Although Moseley-street Unitarian Church has been without a minister for three years, a satisfactory report was submitted at the annual meeting, which was held on Monday, the 25th inst. The year closed with a small balance in hand, and the church is absolutely free from debt, in addition to which there is a sum of nearly £300 in the bank for building purposes. The services have been conducted on thirty-six Sundays during the past twelve months by Unitarian ministers, the remainder being conducted by lay preachers, chiefly members of the congregation.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—The 72nd annual meeting of subscribers and friends was held on March 23, Mr. P. J. Worsley in the chair. The Missionary (the Rev. Thomas Graham), in presenting his fifth annual report, said that the Mission and its many connected institutions were in a good condition. Over a thousand visits had been paid to the homes of people in the district during the year. The religious services and the Sunday school were well attended. There were now 142 scholars, with an average attendance of 105, whilst the proportion of adult scholars was very satisfactory. The penny savings bank had received during the year nearly £210, the highest for several years, the number of depositors reaching just over 300. Thanks were given to the many workers and helpers, and to the committee for their loyal support. The hon. secretary (Mr. Ernest Sibree) read the committee's report, in which they noted their satisfaction at the continued success of all the branches of activity connected with the Mission. They recorded their deep sense of loss the Mission had sustained through the death of Mr. Francis Tagart, Mr. Charles Desprez, Mrs. Moncton, and Mrs. Osborne, who had been supporters for many years. Mr. Charles Desprez had left a legacy of £25. The services of Mr. and Miss Graham and the many voluntary helpers were fully appreciated. Owing to heavy expenditure on repairs and the death of old friends, there was an adverse balance, and the committee appealed for new subscribers and helpers. The hon. treasurer (Mr. J. Kenrick Champion) read the financial report, which showed that the year commenced with a balance of £2, and ended with an adverse balance of £14. The total receipts had been £224 and the expenses £236. The various reports were received, their adoption being moved by the president and seconded by Mr. Charles Cole. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., moved that the cordial thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. and Miss Graham for their loyal and zealous services to the Mission. Mr. Graham had just been admitted to the ranks of the ministry, and he extended to him the right hand of fellowship.

Gullompton.—The Pound-square Chapel, erected in 1815 upon the site of the original meeting house, almost completely collapsed last Sunday afternoon. Fortunately no one was hurt, as the accident occurred between a special afternoon service for young people and the hour for the assembling of the congregation for evening worship. Neighbours observed the falling of the west walls and gave an alarm. Members of the congregation collected, and sought to save some of the chapel furniture. Then the roof gave way, and a hasty retreat became necessary. The wreck was pitiful, but an evening service of thanksgiving that no life had been lost was held in a neighbouring house. It had been realised that certain restorations were necessary, and these were shortly to have been proceeded with, a sum of about £177 having been collected for the purpose. Steps have already been taken to secure the best professional advice. It being "Exchange Sunday" amongst the Devon ministers, the Rev. J. Worthington was away at Crediton, and the day's services were being conducted by the Rev. W. B. Matthews, of Colyton. It is hoped for the present to hold the Sunday services and school in a neighbouring hall.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street Church.—A conference of the members of the Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union was held at the Vincent-street Church on Saturday, March 9, when Mr. Ion Pritchard delivered an address on "The Sunday School Problem."

Kentish Town: Free Christian Church.—The Rev. Stephen Györfi, of Kolozsvár, the Hungarian student at Manchester College, Oxford, will conduct the services at the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, on Sunday next, March 31.

Sheffield District: Appointment.—The Rev. Thomas Anderson, late Congregational minister at Mexborough, has been appointed District Missionary for the Sheffield and District Association of Unitarian, Free Christian, and Free Congregational Churches. Mr. Anderson will reside in Mexborough, and will have special charge of the flourishing Free Christian Church recently formed there, as well as of the church at Bolton-on-Dearne, which he founded a year ago. He will also have pastoral oversight of the church at Barnsley.

South-East Wales.—The Rev. T. P. Spedding paid a visit recently to South-East Wales on behalf of the Unitarian Association. The Rev. J. Park Davies, secretary of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society, arranged the programme and accompanied Mr. Spedding during the greater part of the week. Sunday services were held at Swansea, Trebanos, and Nottage, and meetings at Cefn Coed, Mountain Ash, Pontypridd, Aberdare, Wick, Bridgend, Clydach Vale, and Pentre. Mr. Spedding also met ministers or representatives of the churches at Cardiff, Newport, Dowlais, Merthyr and Cwmbach. At Swansea the interesting announcement was made that at the evening service a score of new members would be welcomed into the fellowship of the church by the treasurer, Mrs. Reid, and the secretary, Mr. C. H. Perkins, and that an address would be delivered by the minister, Rev. Simon Jones. Mention was also made of the forthcoming annual meeting, when the society will attain its majority, an event it is to celebrate by the completion of an endowment fund which has been raised since the last meeting, and that amounts to £500. Trebanos is awaiting its new minister, Rev. D. G. Rees, who is leaving Bridgend after eight years' work. The church is situated far up the Swansea valley. Morning services are held in the mountain chapel at Gellionen, and at both places the services are in Welsh. Great heartiness characterised the meeting at Cefn Coed, where the institutions are in a flourishing condition under the leadership of the Rev. Carrara Davis. On Wednesday the visitor came into touch with a new movement. The congregation at Mountain Ash, with its minister, Rev. George Neighbour, has recently joined the South-East Wales Society. It is five years since a large number of Mr. Neighbour's former congregation withdrew from the Baptist denomination, and since that time they have carried on services in different premises. Two cottages were eventually purchased and altered so as to afford class-rooms, and on the land behind a hall has been built. Most of the work was done by members of the church, and they rejoice to-day in the possession of a useful set of premises. There is an average attendance of over 150 at the evening service, and the membership is steadily growing. On Thursday the evening meeting was at Pontypridd, and a large audience assembled. The church has made much progress during the last few years under the ministry of the Rev. J. Park Davies. The meeting on Friday was at the Old Meeting House at Aberdare, and friends were present from the Highland-place Church. The Rev. Glynne Davis is the pastor, and the Rev. R. J. Jones still resides among the people with whom he has spent so many years of active ministerial work. On Saturday, Mr. Spedding and the Rev. D. G. Rees drove to the little chapel at Wick, and despite boisterous weather there was a good attendance of friends who are anxious as to the future of the church after the departure of Mr. Rees from Trebanos. Similar concern was expressed at an early meeting at Bridgend, which was held on Sunday morning before the visitor's departure for Nottage, where a large congregation assembled in the evening, the service being conducted by the Rev. W. J. Phillips, and the sermon preached by Mr. Spedding. The visitor returned from his tour feeling that in South-East Wales, as well as in every other part of the country he has visited this winter, there are good grounds for congratulation, and many indications of increased congregational activity and growing hopefulness.

Wakefield: The late George Webster, J.P.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. G. Webster, which occurred on the 23rd inst. He was a devoted and consistent adherent, who had long been a trustee of Westgate Chapel, and he only resigned the office of treasurer, which he had held for 16½ years, at the beginning of the present month. He was originally a member of the Society of Friends, but in middle life became a Unitarian. Mr. Webster was for several years treasurer of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and had also served a year as its president. A staunch Liberal in politics all his life, he had held several offices in the local association. He also devoted no small portion of his time to the trading interests in the West Riding, and had held offices in the Wakefield Tradesmen's Association, the West Riding Federated Chamber of Trade and the Wakefield Tradesmen's Benevolent Institution. He established an important business in Wakefield, where he also rendered faithful service as a magistrate, a County Councillor, and in other capacities, winning general esteem and respect. Mr. Webster leaves three sons and two daughters. His wife predeceased him by about twelve years. The funeral took place on Tuesday, March 26, in the burial ground of Westgate Chapel, the service, which was attended by the mayor, city magistrates, and representatives of many local bodies, being conducted by the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, of Leeds.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

SMOKE AND MOTHS.

With the Smoke Abatement Exhibition and Sir William Ramsay's startling declarations in mind, it is interesting to speculate on the possibility of many things of beauty being restored to us when the atmosphere of the industrial districts is rendered more pure. Investigations are being made at the Manchester University in regard to the change in colour of many British moths during the last 60 or 70 years, and it has been discovered that many pale-coloured varieties in Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, Durham, Leicestershire and Monmouth are assuming a dark, if not black appearance, owing indirectly to the smoky atmosphere. The best example of this change of hue is the "peppered" moth, says the Manchester Guardian. The original type of "peppered" moth, with its black and white marking, is not at all conspicuous as it rests on tree trunks in the south and other rural localities. It resembles a piece of lichen or loose bark, and is well protected by its general inconspicuousness.

But the conditions in which many moths live are now very different from what they were seventy years ago. The vast amount of smoke poured out from countless chimneys in our industrial districts has blackened the trees and fences. The consequence is that the old black and white "peppered" moths would now be conspicuous resting on black tree trunks, and would probably fall a prey to the first bird that noticed them. It appears likely that this selection has been carried to such a pitch as to make it now impossible to find a black and white "peppered" moth in many of the large manufacturing districts.

There are, however, many instances in which the black variety is found in localities far removed from the influence of smoke, where the tree trunks are as clean and light-coloured as at any previous time. This may suggest some useful ideas to lecturers on social reform whose object it is to emphasise the pernicious effects on character, intellect, and bodily vigour of sordid surroundings and a polluted atmosphere.

CRUELTY-TO CHILDREN.

At the annual dinner of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children early in the week, the chairman, Lord Brassey, said the society, which was now in its twenty-eighth year, had taken a recognised place in the life of the nation. In the first year the aggregate subscriptions were not £1,000. In its twenty-seventh year the income had increased to no less than £67,000. They made an appeal for further aid because the number of cases with which they had to deal was constantly increasing. The number dealt with had increased from 95 in the first year of the society to no less than 74,123 last year. It was pointed out that the society worked from 1,432 centres, and that it had dealt with one and a half millions of suffering children since it came into existence. There was now hardly a child from one end of the land to the other who had not sufficient protection, and that was largely due to the women of England, no fewer than 150,000 of whom were interested in the work of the society.

THE LEADER OF THE ITALIAN SUFFRAGISTS.

A correspondent in Rome has sent some details to the Manchester Guardian relating to Donna Giacinta Martini, whose death has caused profound sorrow in Roman society. For some twenty years a great invalid, Donna Giacinta has fought her disease and kept it at bay purely by her indomitable courage and vigorous mental qualities. Rarely if ever seen outside her house, she was yet a spiritual force in Rome, fed always, as says one who knew her, by some mysterious flame of energy. In her the women's suffrage movement in Italy has lost its most conspicuous advocate and its ardent yet wise leader. Aristocratic by birth and temperament (she was born Contessa Marescotti, of a well-known family), Donna Giacinta had thrown aside antiquated traditions and caste prejudices and allied herself to modern thoughts and interests. Fragile and suffering, she would attend the meetings of which she was president, and by her clear thought, idealism, and fervour inspire all who worked with her. Few could fill the void she leaves.

A SUNKEN FOREST.

The recent stormy weather has resulted in a prehistoric forest being discovered on the south Pembrokeshire coast. The action of the waves has resulted in a large quantity of sand being washed away, and masses of black rocks and gnarled trees, the trunks of which are in some cases in a splendid state of preservation, are plainly visible. A large bone has also been found about 4 ft. long by about 18 in. wide, which is evidently a portion of some huge prehistoric mammal. The land at this spot was undoubtedly covered in remote ages with a dense forest, which may have disappeared from sight owing to a great landslide. It is believed in the neighbourhood that another sunken forest lies below high water mark at Whitehands.

THE PEASANT AND THE POLITICIAN.

In speaking of the establishment of the National Theatre in Ireland at Aberystwyth University College last week, Mr. W. B. Yeats said that nationality was a very self-conscious thing, and they as Irish people had many resemblances to the Welsh. In England, when they would educate people, they went to the library and asked them to read books. In Ireland they did not do that; they went to the peasant, because the only thing left to them of their old life was this love of poetry and song among the people. All their movements went down to that, and they tried to get from it the inspiration which would win their young men. In Ireland their young men were always being drawn away by politics in some form or other. A man must be a politician if he was going to be a good citizen, but he must not be a politician when he was a writer. So they went down to the peasant, and in that way they got away from the fussy, modern world.

* * *

The Irish countryman, Mr. Yeats continued, had inherited from the old world a passionate interest in life itself. The peasant knew nothing of the pretty; the pretty belonged to the town. He knew the beautiful and the grotesque. They thought in Ireland if they could bring this culture of the people into the towns it would have a great effect there, because they believed patriotism would make their people take it into their minds and study it as they never would study anything that came from books.

THE OXFORD MILLENNARY.

Oxford will celebrate its thousandth year of recorded history on July 11 with a special pageant. Mr. Laurence Binyon, Mr. Laurence Housman, Sir A. Quiller-Couch, Mr. A. D. Godley, Professor Oman and Dr. Skrine will be responsible for the various episodes. The programme also includes a service in the Cathedral and lunch in the Town Hall, and an oration is to be delivered in the gardens of New College. It is hoped that the pageant will take place in the beautiful gardens of Worcester College, and nothing but radiant weather will be needed to make the event a great success.

THE TOLSTOY MANUSCRIPTS.

It is particularly unfortunate that a dispute should have arisen between the authorities connected with the Moscow Historical Museum and Princess Alexandra, the daughter to whom Tolstoy left all his manuscripts, "wheresoever found and by whomsoever kept," unreservedly. Princess Alexandra is the only member of Tolstoy's family in sympathy with his ideas, and as she shares her father's views as to the wrongness of enforcing rights and demands by the aid of the law, legal action is out of the question. The manuscripts include diaries and letters of an intimate character, to some of which doubtless the Princess wishes to give further publicity. For many reasons the family object to this, and uphold the decision of the Museum authorities, so the only hope lies in an appeal to public opinion. The matter is one of importance owing to Tolstoy's world-wide reputation, and the eagerness with which any fresh light which can be thrown on his life and personality would be welcomed throughout Europe.

FASHIONABLE FURS.

The responsibility for the cruelty practised by trappers on the beautiful animals from which furs are obtained does not rest with women only, as the writer of a little illustrated booklet on the subject, published by Our Animal Brothers' Guild, points out. The slaughter of these innocent creatures has enormously increased since the advent of the motor-car, and men now muffle themselves in coats and rugs of skins quite as much as women. The London auctions are supplied with opossum, wallaby, wombat, and red fox from Australia, chiefly from Queensland. A traveller writes of meeting a Queensland fur trader in whose employ were four men. Their daily "bag" amounted to seventy opossums, twelve bears, and fifteen kangaroos. He tells of a town possessing five hotels and three "stores" almost exclusively kept up by the fur trade; of a family who, in three years, made enough by fur trading to buy and stock a farm; and of a single firm who, in one year, bought a quarter of a million skins.

* * *

Mr. Howard Moore gives a description in the pamphlet referred to of the various traps which are used in the fur trade. Most of the skins used as furs are obtained by catching animals in traps, and death comes usually at the close of hours, or even days, of intense suffering and terror. The one chiefly used is the steel trap, the most villainous instrument of arrest ever invented by the human mind. It is not an uncommon thing for the savage jaws of this monstrous instrument to bite off the leg of the would-be captive at a single stroke. If the leg is not completely amputated by the snap of the terrible steel, it is likely to be so deeply cut as to encourage the animal to gnaw and twist it off. In this way many animals escape. Trappers say that on an average one animal out of every five caught has three legs only.

The annual report of the Pearl Life Assurance Company states that the year's results are of a very satisfactory description, and the work entailed by the recent amalgamation now being complete, high hopes are entertained for the future prosperity of the combined companies. The total income for the year amounted to £2,949,666 2s. 9d., being an increase of £133,828 15s. 7d. over that of the previous year. The company has paid 128,905 life claims, grants, and matured endowments during the year, amounting, with bonuses, to £1,056,299 0s. 5d., which, added to the sums previously paid, make a total of £12,700,264 6s. 9d. The assurance funds now amount to £6,991,406 6s. 3d., which show an increase of £621,061 18s. 8d. for the year, making the total funds, with capital laid up, £7,593,480 0s. 6d.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE rejection of the Conciliation Bill by a narrow majority in the House of Commons last week has caused profound disappointment in many quarters. Sympathy will be especially strong with Mrs. Fawcett and the body of able and convinced women who have devoted a lifetime to the cause and have never lost courage. But they have won their way steadily in public esteem, and time and effort have not been lost. Few people believe that Women's Suffrage will be the beginning of the Millennium, or that the moral instincts of men and women are profoundly different. Some women are far nobler than some men. Some men are better and keener for the public good than some women. But a growing number of people recognise, on the one hand, that the municipal franchise carries with it the parliamentary vote as its completion, and, on the other, that the closer association of men and women in public responsibilities has in it the germ of a nobler type of citizenship for the future.

It has been decided to erect a bronze statue of Dr. Gore in the Cathedral grounds at Birmingham as a memorial of his episcopate. We are not surprised that Dr. Gore describes the proposal as "distressing." He has gone as far as he could without actually vetoing the proposal in the following words:—"I hope you will express to the Committee my mingled sense of gratitude and repugnance." We are in entire agreement with the prevailing instinct against erecting statues of living men, and we hope that the Birmingham fashion will not be copied in other towns.

DR. JAMES KERR, the Chief Medical Officer for Education of the London County Council, has just issued his annual report on the health of children in the public elementary schools of the metropolis. The statistics given of physical inefficiency are so alarming that public attention ought to be called to the matter in every possible way. Out of 172,619 children examined in 1910 only about half were returned as free from any definite organic defect. Dr. Kerr attributes this state of things in the main to sheer poverty and the consequent bad feeding. Improvement is detected at once when children are supplied with milk or are given breakfast and dinner at school. On Tuesday night the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in introducing the Budget, pointed out that 441,000 adults died in the United Kingdom last year, leaving property amounting to £270,000,000. One-half of this enormous sum belonged to 970 persons. There can, we fear, be little peace or happiness for the body politic which has this enormous inflation of wealth at one end of the social scale, counterbalanced by a vast crowd of half-starved children at the other. Health lectures and schools for mothers are excellent in their way and they have our fullest sympathy, but at bottom this problem of health is not so much a question of knowledge as of money.

WE have received some further letters on "Methods of Violence," but we have decided to close the correspondence. In doing so it is only fair to add that Mr. Lummis asks us to say that while he adheres to his faith that moral good and evil are states of the spirit, not items in a code, he repudiates the construction placed upon his views, and the inferences drawn from them, by the Editor and some correspondents. On our side we should like to add, that it is the inference, which many people find it natural to draw from the position, that makes us suspect a fallacy. We believe that the teaching both of Christ and St. Paul, so far from breaking away from the Moral Law in the interests of spiritual liberty, accepts and honours it as holy and just and good. This opens the whole question of the meaning of freedom in the New Testament, a subject which might be discussed with a good deal of profit in our columns, when we have escaped from the dominating influence of present emotions.

WE have, perhaps, no right to complain that we have had to incur charges of smug respectability and of exploiting religion in the interests of reaction, because we have tried to help our readers to see the real moral issues involved in this question. It is the penalty which editors, like other mortals, have to accept as the price of independence, and of a sincere effort to recall men to eternal principles amid the stormy passions of controversy. For good and sufficient reasons we do not devote much attention to the political machinery of the great movements of our day, but week by week our columns bear witness to our deep interest in noble efforts of progress and reform, in the widening influence of womanhood, and the righteous demand for a larger share of the wealth and happiness of life for all. But it happens sometimes that those who have toiled and suffered for these things have to refuse the weapons which rash and enthusiastic friends would place in their hands, and to be loyal and chivalrous enough to their cause to say plain No, even when victory seems to be in sight. It is in such moments of disappointment, when the soul commits itself and its cause to God, as we tried to explain last week, that men enter into fellowship with the Cross. To say this and to maintain it with all the faithfulness of which we are capable, is something very different from exploiting religion in the interests of easy respectabilities or a cowardly patience. It is often the hardest kind of discipline which the human spirit has to bear.

THE CHRISTIAN CONQUEST OF DEATH.

HOWEVER anxious we may be to do even-handed justice to the sentiments and ideas of the Græco-Roman world; however much we may object to the kind of Christian apology which blackens Paganism in order to brighten by contrast the splendour of our Faith, we must not underestimate the extraordinary superiority of Christianity. The studies of Prof. DILL in Roman society of the Empire have revealed the rare nobility and the singular charm and graciousness of a great deal of the life of that passing and perishing world. But they also show its prevailing callousness and seething corruption. Many of the ancients looked bravely on the face of death, but their bravery was usually an iron stoicism, a melancholy endurance, or a swaggering defiance of a grim Inexorable.

Before the spectacle of final dissolution the religion of the ancient Greeks quailed in impotence except when, as in the case of men like SOCRATES, there is a sincere belief in immortality. Mr. LOWES DICKENSON, whose sympathies are profoundly pagan, has told us in his "Greek View of Life" that just in proportion as the life of the Greeks "was fuller and richer than that which has been lived by any other race, just in proportion as their capacity for enjoyment, in body and soul, was keener as their senses were finer, their intellect broader, their passions more intense, must they have felt with peculiar emphasis the horror of decay and death. And such in fact is the characteristic note of their utterances on this theme." Those of us who are not classical scholars may test this for themselves in those beautiful and vivid translations of some of the Greek dramas and tragedies with which Prof. GILBERT MURRAY has enriched the world. In the midst of so much that is fine and stimulating even to the point of spiritual grandeur we feel the overhanging gloom and the presence of the sombre and enigmatic features of Fate. Mr. LOWES DICKENSON writes that "the fear of age and death is the shadow of the love of life: and on no people has it fallen with more horror than on the Greeks. The tenderest of their songs of love close with a sob: and it is an autumn wind that rustles in their bowers of spring."

The characteristic pagan outlook, spite of its beauty, had thus no real vista of a spiritual Beyond. Every joy ended in the tomb. A sense of the essential vanity of life brooded over a decrepit world or lingered as a regret in the midst of poetic memories of a Golden Age. Inappetably hungry for some satisfaction of the keen torment of living, recourse was had to strange foreign cults and mysteries imported from Egypt, Persia and the East. The Empire was not merely ripe for Christianity, it was rotten. Into this world our Faith came with a spring-tide of abundant life and immortality. It looked cheerfully beyond death and contemplated it with a certain strange joyousness and exultant serenity. We find its spirit in the Alexandrian Liturgy, "Assemble them, O LORD, in green pastures, beside the still waters in the paradise of joy whence grief and sadness and groans are banished." It lifted a heavy stone from the entombed heart of Humanity and gave to emotion a new freedom and scope which swept beyond the grey ramparts of the natural world. It abolished death and brought life and incorruption to light. It did that once. Does it do it now?

In many respects our modern world resembles the old. Spite of the magnificence of our twentieth century secular achievements, spite of its wealth and power—spite of or because of this?—a dull and numbing disquietude reigns. Philosophy and Art try to minister their customary consolations, but they heal the hurt of the people too slightly. The sternest energies of men are concentrated on the accumulation of material goods. But ever and again, suddenly in the midst of the whirligig of commerce, there comes a dead hush and out of the stillness a Voice, "Thou fool, this night shall thy life be required of thee." Some seek to forget it in a more hectic fever. They give themselves to modern counterparts of gladiatorial games, and luxurious sensations, to vice and to amusements that are not merely vapid but degrading. They are like gamblers in a sinking ship that play the last throw or drink their last cup ere the waters engulf them.

Even the cults and mysteries of our time that come again offering health and immortality fail to solace, except temporarily and as the latest fashion, the anæmic agnosticism of the age. Can Christianity speak again to the world a convincing Easter Message? We think it can, but not in the old way. It cannot establish the fact of Immortality on the resurrection of the physical body of Jesus. It cannot come again with miraculous and supernatural revelation in the old quasi-magical sense of those words. To some, indeed, a new supernaturalism may come by way of the psychical phenomena of Spiritism. Ecstatic and death-bed visions will be accepted by such as proof of personal immortality. They will fall into line with other apparitions of the dead to the living. They will make rents in the wall between this life and life after death, and convince the convinced that there is no wall except our own sensual illusions. Most men will interpret these psychical phenomena as mere hallucinations; others will accept them as genuine instances in harmony with the recorded apparitions of our Lord to the disciples. We offer no dogmatic opinion on these things. But the problem of immortality cannot wait the verdict of researchers in these strange seas of thought. It is usually solved by other considerations, and chief of all by a simple reflection on the spiritual nature of man. Actually and usually it is solved by a reductio ad absurdum, by the unreasonableness of believing in the extinction of man's personal consciousness. The question is closed by a sheer daring affirmation of faith. It is finally settled by the refusal of the mind to accept an unproved and unprovable view which would bring permanent contradiction and irresolvable discord into our emotional and rational life. Man's thought is too vast, his passion too opulent, his speculation too imaginative, his moral aspiration too noble to believe in the nullity or irrationality of the scheme or chaos of things. He demands some aim to effort, some fruition to love, some ultimate satisfaction to the longings of life. He will find or by faith affirm a guarantee in the reality of things that his struggles and sacrifices and tragedies avail; he will insist as on a first principle of sanity that the conservation of value, the triumph of Righteousness, is not contingent on the possibly brief span and precarious future of this planet's existence. He cries to the Earth,

"Ay, Mother! Mother!

What is this Man, thy darling kissed and cuffed,

Thou lustingly engender'st;

To sweat, and make his brag and rot,

Crowned with all honour and all shamefulness?

From nightly towers

He dogs the secret footsteps of the heavens,

Sifts in his hands the stars, weighs them as gold-dust,

And yet is he successive unto nothing

But patrimony of a little mould

And entail of four planks?"

It is that cry that shivers all the thin Agnosticisms like pale iridescent bubbles, and makes secular Rationalism itself the most irrational madness ever exuded out of Bedlam at full moon. What healthy spiritual faith that has once felt the presence of GOD in CHRIST can believe that the mouth of man has been made

"Avid of all dominion and all mightiness,
All sorrow, all delight, all topless grandeurs,
All beauty, and all starry majesties,
And dim transtellar things; even that it may,

Filled in the ending with a puff of dust,
Confess 'It is enough.'"

No vigorous and heroic morality can permanently accept such a brutal anti-climax to the spirit and vision of Faith. Yet that anti-climax is the last word, "earth to earth; ashes to ashes, and dust to dust" is the final dirge of all when this planet swims sterile and lifeless through space, unless we see that the Divinity of Man is too great and too holy for such an end.

We may try to escape the horror of the negative conclusion. We may seek to wrap up that hideous nullity in all kinds of sensuous refinements, we may endeavour desperately to deceive ourselves and talk idle talk of the immortality of moral influence and of the choir invisible, but we cannot quite succeed in forgetting that there will be neither moral influence nor choir in that dread day, that dies irae of destiny and irretrievable doom when the iron shutters have dropped on man's little stage and the theatre of life itself is left empty and dark. True, no conscious mind will be there to confront the mockery of the void, but we are here now to confront it as minds that look before and after, and we ask the question in anticipation—To what purpose these Gethsemanes and Calvaries that have come to nought? To what purpose this life of man and this final futility?

His heart is builded

For pride, for potency, infinity,
All heights, all deeds and all immensities,
Arrased with purple like a house of kings.”
And to what end so great a heart?

“To stall the grey rat, and the carrion-worm Stately lodge.”

Sanity recoils at last from such a conclusion. Christianity brings home to us this anti-climax, because it brings home to us the Majesty of Man in CHRIST, and shows him too great for death. When PAUL saw Law put CHRIST to death, he saw that one of the two was wrong, and his moral instinct saw that the grandeur of CHRIST had for ever shattered the Law. When we to-day see Death dissolve so godlike a life we know that one of the two is an illusion, and our moral instinct recognises that the glory of Christ has for ever shattered Death.

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN PULPIT

THE MEMORIAL SERVICE OF DISCIPLESHIP.

BY THE REV. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

“Verily, the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.”—MARK x. 45.

THE Gospel passage, of which that is the concluding verse, presents to us the tradition of the ministry of Jesus as it was held by the disciples of the first generation after his death. Some of its features, we can hardly doubt, are moulded by their own after-thought. Their knowledge, for instance, of what happened at the Master's death may very well have given a definiteness to the words of prediction as to his coming sufferings, beyond anything that was in his own mind or was ever uttered by his lips. But that need not hinder us from recognising that he clearly foresaw what must be the end of his life of ministry, his fearless and uncompromising preaching of the Kingdom of God.

Whether he spoke the actual words or not, as to the giving of his life a ransom for many, he did the thing, and the recognition of it became an impulse of new life to the world, in love and gratitude and reverent discipleship. He was ready to suffer, and if need be to die, and he called his followers to the same high service, in self-renunciation and true brotherly love, that they and all whom they could reach and help might be led together into the more perfect life and the joy of the Kingdom of God. His life was given, a ransom for many—a price paid, not to appease an angry deity, but to overcome the conditions of evil in the world, to overcome sinful and hard hearts, and by the power of his great love to kindle in them a new loyalty to things pure and true and good.

So he delivered men into a new freedom, as children of God, and from that time to this, his ideal of manhood, of the true life with God, the inwardness of his appeal for righteousness, for a pure and gentle and loving spirit in the brotherhood of men, and his secret of self-renunciation, faithful unto death, have found an answering witness in innumerable hearts. Here, men have felt and said, is the true light of the world. No clearer, purer truth has dawned for us; we find no truer leader, no better friend in all that most concerns our deeper life and the welfare of the world.

Other ideals have been set before the world, but for us at least the spirit of the Christian life makes the most profound appeal, and in the life of Jesus himself and many followers of his in every generation it is vindicated as supreme. The Christian world has indeed too often been false to the spirit of the Master, and the churches, by their enmities and bitter conflicts, cruel persecutions, worldly ambitions, blindness to human needs and neglect of urgent claims of brotherhood, have denied their Lord. But no faithlessness, no false professions, can destroy the purity of the ideal or the urgency of its appeal. That, we know, is what is asked of us; that is the kind of man we ought to be; that ideal of the kingdom, in a true brotherhood of the children of God here on earth, contains for us the secret of life, the standard of our faith and our endeavour.

If we want a new courage in fidelity to duty, a new strength to stand for truth and righteousness, fresh sympathy and insight into our brothers' needs, more of the love that will hope and endure all things, new patience and courage to bear heavy burdens, to face grievous loss, to take up a cross of pain, to enter the valley of the shadow, in every such case, while our prayer is to the Supreme Giver of all good, that we may be surrendered to our Father's will and be strong in his strength, this becomes to us the more real, a more living prayer, as we are consciously upborne by the strength of human companionship and sympathy. For so we find our truest life. “He prayeth best who loveth best,” and we take our needs to our Father, for his help, and find that help the more fully as we realise our human comradeship in this world, and the greater communion of the Unseen. Often and often the help our Father gives to us is in the help of our friends, and the deepening sense of sympathy and mutual encouragement. We receive great gifts through the enlightenment and kindling of friendship, through the love of an understanding heart. Remembering the one Source of our life, the quickening Spirit, the Giver of all good, we help one another to be more trustful, more patient, more glad and thankful, more brave and true.

And in that true human fellowship of our deeper life, whatever be our need, the sense of fellowship with Jesus—the actual personal friend and teacher—human through and through—the chief of faithful souls—is an unfailing help. That is why we are Christians, in the reverent spirit of discipleship—because we feel this to be the supreme truth of our human life, and he is in very deed the Friend of all—one who gave his life for his brethren's sake, to help and uplift, who loved and suffered and was faithful unto death. The spirit of his life quickens ours. The memory of his cross helps us to endure. His gentleness and patience and forgivingness subdue our pride and hardness of heart; his compassionate and loving spirit touches ours to finer issues. The communion of his prayer draws us nearer to our Father in a great peace and strength and joy.

We do not dogmatise about the place of Jesus in the religious life of the world. It is a matter of history and experience and of the inward witness. As we find that there is none other who so helps us to be true and makes clear to us the light of the divine purpose in our life, we gladly and thankfully take our place among his disciples.

And it is because of the helpfulness of that touch of human sympathy and kindling inspiration, that some of us are still glad to hold to the observance of the special service of communion, which recalls the last supper of Jesus with his closest friends and followers, and draws more closely for us the bonds of personal loyalty and affection in our own discipleship. At this Easter time the commemoration has a special significance, and the service as we hold it, on the actual anniversary, the evening before Good Friday, gains an added power of sacred association.

We are well aware that some of the most earnest of Christians, notably the members of the Society of Friends, refuse altogether the observance of this service. To them it is a bar rather than a help to true communion. Yet others, equally sincere, and as deeply conscious of the inwardness of the true Christian life, find that the memorial act strengthens the bonds of the inward union, and are thankful for the sacred associations which gather about the outward observance. The symbolism of the common meal, the eating together of the broken bread, and drinking of the one cup, is a real help to them. Even those who are by no means convinced that Jesus himself had any thought of founding a church, as it afterwards grew up in the world, or of instituting a rite which should be observed from generation to generation as a memorial of his own life, find it natural, and beautiful, and helpful, so to recall the memory of his life and death, his willing sacrifice, the love with which he gave himself for his brethren's sake, and the power of that spirit, which binds his followers together in close union, pledged to loyalty in grateful love and reverence and self-renouncing service.

Whatever critical research may make of the gospel record, it seems clear that the first disciples remembered how Jesus had broken bread with them, and how at the last supper, just before his death, he had taken a cup and with a word of blessing had bidden them all drink of it, as a token of their union and a pledge of their hope that they would be hereafter united together in the heavenly kingdom. It was thus an act of faith, with a forward look, prompted by strong affection; and the memory of it, after he was gone, might well be to them an incentive to faithfulness and undying hope. And when, after the tragedy of the cross, and the triumph of their faith in the risen Christ, victorious over death, they gathered together for the breaking of bread, for the common brotherly meal, it vividly recalled to them his presence in their midst, his love so richly poured upon them and the gracious influence of his life. They shared the bread and once more drank of the cup—and whether it was an express injunction of his or not, it was natural that they should do it in remembrance of him. So the communion of the Last Supper grew by its own spontaneous power of helpfulness into a rite of the Christian Church, a pledge of discipleship, a sacred privilege reserved for those who confessed Jesus and were admitted into the circle of his friends and followers. It was at first a family meal, in which the members were drawn together in close affection, and the holiest memories were recalled, for solace and for inspiration.

Afterwards, it is true, other elements were introduced; ideas connected with the mysteries of Greek and Oriental religions made their influence felt, and the doctrine of the body and blood of Christ underwent strange developments, and became, alas! subject of bitter controversy and cruel persecution in the church. But with those perversions of the simple memorial act we have here nothing to do.

The question for us is whether the chain of sacred memories and aspiration in this communion, from one generation to another, still holds us and is a living force in our discipleship. The outward participation in the broken bread and the drinking together of one cup is a symbolic act. It must be done in all simplicity, with no touch of superstition, out of the heart of pure affection and earnest purpose. By it we recall the presence of the Master with his friends in true human companionship, on the eve of the bitterest trial of his life, and after that the exultant victory of faith and love stronger than death, and then the gathering of those who from generation to generation, down to our own time, have sought to be together in that same fellowship, true to the same spirit.

Thus, in its inward purpose, it is an act of true communion. It is also a eucharist, as it was in the first age of the church, a giving of thanks to the Father of all, for what he has given us in Jesus, and in the union of his disciples, both in the living fellowship of the church and in that greater communion of the Unseen, in which we are with those who have gone before us into the world of light. And it is a sacrament, like the oath of allegiance taken by the Roman soldier, a pledge, by this outward sign and act of discipleship, an acknowledgment before

God and in presence of our brethren, for mutual encouragement, that we truly desire to be followers of Christ, to be found faithful in the spirit of our lives. It is not in the least a profession of extra virtue or religiousness, but a confession of earnest purpose and thankfulness, in all humility, a confession of need and aspiration.

The Communion of the last supper in the Christian Church has been made, in one branch of it, into the sacrifice of the Mass, and in other connections has taken on other forms of belief which no longer hold our conscience or mind or heart. But setting aside all that perverts the natural simplicity of the act of remembrance, can we not still find helpful reality in the symbolism of this memorial, and is it not well that we should keep a hold upon this outward sign of an abiding fellowship, and this added confession of the worth of our Christian heritage?

To our communion in this Memorial Service we gladly welcome all, of whatever name or creed or religious connection, who desire so to be together, to enter more deeply into the Master's spirit of faithfulness and love and willing sacrifice, to make single-hearted confession of discipleship, and so to strengthen the bonds of fellowship in the hidden life of faith and aspiration and affection. To the world such an outward observance may appear foolishness; to some it may be a stumbling-block. To share with us in this memorial act and this special service of communion we invite all who may find in it any measure of help, in the hope that it may be to them, as it is to some of us with growing power, natural and beautiful, and rich in sacred associations and memories, which blend with the deepest experiences of our life.

VERSES.

WHEN overarched by gorgeous night
I waive my trivial self away;
When all I was to all men's sight
Has vanished with the vanished day;
Then do I cast my cumbering load,
Then do I gain a sense of God.
Not him that with fantastic boast
A savage people thought they knew;
The rough barbaric God of Hosts
That edged their sword and braced their threw;
A God they pitted 'gainst a swarm
Of neighbours' gods less vast of arm.
A God, like some imperious king,
Wroth, were his realm not duly awed;
A God for ever hearkening
Unto his self-commanded laud;
A God for ever jealous grown
Of coarser wood and graven stone.
O streaming worlds, O crowded sky,
O life, and mine own soul's abyss,
Myself am scarce so small that I Should bow to Deity like this!
This my Begetter? This was what Man in his violent youth begat.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

A DAY DREAM.

Two or three years ago I had a curiously vivid dream. It was much more coherent than my dreams usually are, and only incomplete because there was the sense of something trying to get into it, and being baffled because the instrument was not fine enough. It was a day dream, and it came to me one glorious afternoon in Switzerland. I will not describe the exact spot; it is sufficient to say that I sat with my back against a tree with green glades and shades below me, velvet-brown châteaux dotted about the middle distance, and towering up into the cloudless sky the glittering summits of the Wetterhorn-Eiger Massif, freshly covered and clothed with new-fallen snow. The air was of that absolute transparency familiar in Switzerland, so that it seemed I could almost throw a stone to the top of the Wetterhorn. There were a hundred elusive scents about me, and those drowsy tinklings from distant cows feeding on the cleared slopes which give the sense of its being always afternoon, and are so conducive to day-dreaming. I had a book beside me—it was "The Prelude," I remember—but the influences of the time and place were too strong for any but fragmentary reading. I let it drop; and presently felt stealing over me that sense of inadequacy before the imperious existence of overwhelming beauty; that feeling of striving to take it in and not succeeding, of missing a proffered opportunity, of failing to respond to some great demand, which I suppose most of us have experienced. I rejoiced in it all, and yet knew all the time that I only perceived infinitesimally and rejoiced meanly, and that the sublimity was escaping me because my soul was too small. . . . Suddenly I was back in a church that I knew. I was sitting there near the middle, one of a vast multitude I have never beheld there filling nave, transepts, choir, and even aisles. The church was full of an exquisite mellow light as if the air had flecks of gold in it, softening down all the outlines and leaving things in a semi-indistinctness. I tried to see the faces of the people, but that golden light seemed to veil them from recognition. My eyes wandered to the great east window. The accustomed stained glass was gone; instead there was a scene of snow-crowned peaks, not painted, but as if one looked out upon it through an empty frame. The sense of inadequacy came to me again. I longed that all these others should take in its full beauty, even if I could not. Then I had a sudden fear that they might miss it, and I wanted to cry out "Look through the window," but no words would come. Now I became conscious that there was music in the church. I tried to see who was making it, but the golden mist was so thick about the organ that I could only distinguish a dim form. But that music! I am not fundamentally moved by music as a rule; its deeper secrets are a fountain sealed to me. For the first time I thought I knew what music meant. It was as if a number of exquisite voices sang to me of the illimitable, caught me up into the very life of things, peured an unknown rapture into my soul. And yet it was not all joy, for I felt hurried and eager, helpless to grasp it, as powerless to compass what I heard as before what I saw. I was saying to myself: "I must take this in, understand it, remember it; I must tell these people what I am hearing." I tried to cry "Listen!" as before I had tried to cry "Look." But again I could form no word aloud, and the music soared through the misty spaces of the church, with the passion and splendour of some immeasurable revelation.

I became aware (without any leading up to) that one was speaking—from the pulpit. Again the gathering mist prevented my seeing the speaker. Though the music still went triumphantly on I thought every word was clearly audible. A breathless fear filled me as before, lest I should miss a word. Suddenly it flashed upon me that these words were—the Truth! I knew beyond disputing that here was the Truth. "At last! O, at last!" I seemed to cry voicelessly. A wave of emotion swept through the multitude: they were rocking and swaying under the tremendous words like a cornfield to the wind. It was borne in on me that we were about to behold the face of him who spoke; I longed for and yet shrank from the vision of ultimate loveliness; my being rose to and then sank under the imminent revelation. Now we were all standing. I seized the hand of one near me and felt it trembling and vibrating to the supreme moment like my own. He bent towards me as if to speak . . . Then I was back on my green slope with the chalets and the cows, and the glittering peaks above them. A ray of hot sunshine was falling full on my face, and, as I moved to escape the dazzlement of it, I found that I was grasping firmly a protruding root of the tree. In the distance a peasant called the cows with a musical note, and they were moving slowly down to their tinkling accompaniment. The shadows had not lengthened perceptibly. . . .

I reflected with astonishment that I had never had such a vivid dream experience. Was it a dream? Obviously it must be; here was I on an Alpine slope, and there was that church across the mountains and the land and the sea in a prosaic town in England. Then with a start, and exactly the same feeling of anxiety as had haunted the dream throughout, I strove to recall the words I had heard. In vain. The picture remained bitten in on my brain. The words were gone. The revelation had passed from me. Still only the great Perhaps—and I had thought to have seized the Truth!

Glib and easy "explanations" follow naturally here: the ray of sunshine, the call and the cowbells, and so forth, translating themselves into the golden mist and ineffable music of my dream. Even so, what a wonder, what a mystery, that I, an average and commonplace person of the twentieth century, should discover in myself the unconscious alchemy which, "out of three sounds," could "frame, not a fourth sound, but a star." How will you "explain" that? Nay, how will you explain either waking consciousness or dream consciousness, or the interpenetration of the cosmic harmony and the human spirit in however small or however great a degree? How will you explain my gathering up a few shreds and patches of material beauty into my very ordinary mentality, and straightway weaving them into a pattern of beauty never compassed by my waking thoughts? That from a few odds and ends of conscious perceptions I should seem carried to hover on the very verge of Absolute Beauty and Truth? Is not one driven to declare with George Meredith, though not, indeed, with his meaning—

" . . . that this love of earth reveals
A soul beside our own, to quicken, quell, Irradiate, and through ruinous clouds uplift?"

Shall I ever again find myself "in the same movement of the soul" as on that day? I cannot tell; for it does not seem to come with taking thought.

ANEMONES.

THEIR very name is as soft as a whisper breathed in silence into the ear of Faith. As soft as a zephyr fanning a child's cheek, yet barely moving a wisp of her hair. And the frail, delicate things look their name: One never can think of them as being anchored to the earth. Rather they suggest temporary visitants that have alighted for a while, and, like birds of passage, will soon again be out of sight. A curious sense of being poised ready for flight attaches to them. They have the apprehensiveness of a beauty too ethereal for matter long to hold; they have the look lying in the eyes of a love too delicate for earth. One is reminded by the hint of apartness, of detachment in their fragile loveliness, of "joy, whose hand is ever at his lips, bidding adieu."

A writer, who celebrates the wood-anemone as the loveliest miracle and masterpiece of wild flower perfection, avers that he never sees a rose-flushed cluster of wood-anemones, hastily gathering, as it were with one hand, their green drapery around them, without thinking of wood-nymphs surprised by an intruder just as they had prepared for a plunge into the cool depths of some still and shaded pool.

The Celtic myth relates them to the advent of Aphrodite. There is a day in spring when the Goddess of Love and Beauty appears, and at her presence

"Lo! the bare boughs pranked with white and pink,
And golden clusters, and the green glades starred
With delicate primrose and deep odorous beds
Of violets, and on the tufted meads
With kingcups lit, and cowslip bells, and blue
Sweet hyacinths, and frail anemones,
The broad west wind breathes softly,
and the air
Is tremulous with the lark, and thro'
the woods

The soft full-throated thrushes all day long Flood the green dells with joy, and thro' the dry
Brown fields the sower strides, sowing his seed,
And all is life and song."

And wherever her white foot touches the floor of the woodland, there spring up anemones. Hence her name in Welsh, Olwen (white footmark). To see a whole coppice thickly starred with them, is to realise the truth of the ancient myth. At other times an old wives' fable or a nursery tale, in the days of the Earth's Awakening, it is once more restored to a personal faith and sincere conviction. Nought but the tread of Divine Beauty could so quickly warm the Earth's cold bosom into such fair blooming. This is Earth's response to the pressure of the New Life. As the rock in Rodin's "La Pensée" finds expression in the beautiful head that emerges from its crude bulk, so the aspiration of the earth after the Unfading Perfection that has wooed it and yet eluded it from the dawn of Time, has found utterance in this Elevated Host offered up in the shape of stars upon a gracile stem winged with triune fronds. The same Desire has become vocal in Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound" and in Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," but the Anemone Nemorosa inscribing pale and silver hieroglyphs upon the green gloom of the wood has spoken it in visible runes. The word "grace" sums up the impression made by the wind-flower. And we need not fear the double suggestion of that term.

As an old-fashioned poet sang of

"The coy Anemone, that ne'er uncloses Her bloom until it's blown on by the wind,"

so it may symbolise for us that glade in the soul that is awakened to put forth fair flowers when breathed upon by the wind of the Spirit; and is roused to a sense of the romance of life inherent in every answer made by a denizen of earth to the call of the Divine.

The wood is so full of anemones that one dares not move further lest one should crush their tender stems; so, like a pilgrim who has come in sight of the goal of which he has dreamed through many long winters, nothing is left but to sit down and take one's fill of admiration. The air is resonant with delirious songs of birds, the drumming of the woodpecker as he bores the elm furnishing the bass-viol of the orchestra; and the countless stars on the earth as they swing in the breeze produce such inebriation of the imagination, that kindled fancy aided by some flash of the race-memory at length gains glimpse of the sheen of a robe glancing like the satin-pluming swallow, and the shadowy blossom of dim golden hair. Perhaps it was a dramatisation of W. B. Richmond's "Venus" set against the background of the wood. But for a moment it seemed as if Olwen herself with milk-white feet had passed.

"Athwart that wintry wilderness of thorns
Flashed from her motion splendour like the morn's,

And from her presence life was radiated
Thro' the grey earth and branches bare and dead,
So that her way was paved, and roofed above
With flowers as soft as thoughts of budding love."

A few flowers with the natural filigree of green moss out of which they grew are brought to a sick bed, and the vision is related. At once the dark eyes lose all their agony, as they gloat on the treasures of the wilds. Then as a rapture gathers beneath the welling tears, I withdraw, leaving the beloved blooms to carry their own message and work their own charm. Perhaps she too will see Olwen, and the beauteous hand, whose smoothness never roughens with the long ages, will be placed upon her brow and cure it of its pain.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

SIR,—May I make the following announcements through your columns?

Before this meets the eyes of your readers, all who are entitled to hospitality and have applied for it or for railway vouchers should—apart from accidents—have received the necessary papers.

In addition to the railway facilities named some weeks ago, I may say that persons attending the Conference and staying within 50 miles of Birmingham, can procure from Mr. E. Ellis Townley (88, Colmore-row, Birmingham), or myself, cards of membership (unnecessary for any other purpose), which will enable them to obtain return tickets at a single fare and a third from Birmingham to the place where they reside or are visiting (minimum fare, 1s.). These tickets will be available for return on the same or following day, or from Saturday to Monday.

I sincerely hope that advantage can be taken of these concessions. But perhaps I ought to say that the managers have given me warning that, unless the coal labour troubles are over, and the normal working of the railways is resumed, they will be unable to make good their promise of reduced fares.

I should add that nominations by congregations or societies of persons to serve on the new committee must be in my hands not later than the 9th inst., and notices of motion not later than the 13th inst.—Yours, &c.,

THE INSECT WORLD.

Social Life in the Insect World. By J. H. Fabre. Translated by Bernard Miall. With illustrations. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net

NATURE keeps her lovers young be the tale of their days what it may. How many years is it since Darwin commended the French naturalist, Fabre, as an "inimitable observer"? At the age of ninety, and still a seer in a world that has proved so rich to his patiently searching eye, he has now given us a volume of papers selected from the encyclopaedic records of his researches into the problems of insect life. These valuable studies are beautifully illustrated, and written with the playful ease of a master at home in his subject. What vivid pictures have we here of the comedy and tragedy in that underworld to our own plane of existence wherein countless myriads of diminutive creatures, the real original elfs, imps, pixies, fairies, sprites and goblins, play their parts and have their being.

This insect world is a puppet-stage on which the ways of men and women are rehearsed, save with the significant omission of certain factors as is the case with puppet shows. Here all the antics of the soul are mimicked, but oddly, for the soul seems wanting. Hamlet is acted with the Prince of Denmark left out. Parents we see in this commonwealth, but scarcely fathers or mothers. Here is a giddy bejewelled society without a touch of vanity. Rivals are devoid of spite and comrades of affection. Here is an amorous coterie with no sting of jealousy. Shocking crimes remain unpunished, virtues unrewarded. Here are elfin choirs to whose rare symphonies the poet listens with rapture; listens, but doubts, perchance, of the worship in the hymns they sing. What more ludicrous than the pranks and attitudes of divers creeping things? Yet never did the muscles of one of them relax in a smile. A world so quaint, so ingenious, so fantastically lovely, so merry and yet so absurdly grave. This thronging society is devoid, to all appearances, of a tremor of sympathy. Over this perpetual drama of pain no one of its immediate actors or spectators ever shed a tear. Yet who would dream of accusing M. Fabre of insincerity when he tells us that the palpitation of insect music is more to him than the silent sublimity of the constellations? "The atom telling of its joys makes me forget the spectacle of the stars."

We may, however, reasonably inquire whether this musical atom does chirp, fiddle or sing with intent to tell forth its joy. The Cigale, or Cicada, may help us in our inquiry. This insect will sit all day long in the warm patch of sunshine on the trunk of a tree, sipping the juice through the punctured bark and shifting its position only as the sun shifts his. All the while it keeps on repeating its note; why? This cannot be a love-call, for his mate is beside him all the day. It is not a challenge, for there is never a contest. In this clashing of the cymbals of the Cigale, as in the violin of the grasshopper and the bagpipe of the tree-frog, Fabre sees simply an expression of the joy of living. His translator, Mr. Bernard Miall, suggests another explanation. May it not serve a purpose similar to that of the sheep-bell? The Cigale is, with advantage, gregarious in its habits, and the perpetual note may serve to keep the herd together. Neither hypothesis quite clears the matter up, since the insect is insensitive to what are very loud sounds to our ears. Fabre borrowed the municipal cannon used by the local corporation on festive occasions, and fired them within a few yards of a company of chirping Cigales. They were totally undisturbed by the detonation. The exhaustive explanation of the Cigale's musical instrument is in itself a fine achievement.

Another problem which has taxed the patient ingenuity of the observer for years and left him with somewhat vague results, is the means by which the female insect attracts her mate. Experiments with the Great Emperor and Oak Eggar Moths convinced Fabre that neither sight nor scent, as ordinarily understood, is the medium of recognition; but that associated with odour are other qualities not yet understood which he would compare with the X-rays of light; and that it is by these subtle undulations, the X-rays of odour that the invitation is conveyed to the male at a remote distance, it may be of several miles. The sight of forty great Emperor Moths flapping through the house in the twilight of a summer evening to pay court to the beauty who had just emerged from her chrysalis must have been a moving sight.

An impressive, not to say tragic, feature is exhibited in the amazing ferocity of certain female insects. Higher up the organic scale it is the male that presents the more aggressive and rapacious qualities. Insects have not shared in the means of developing parental affection that lies in the reduction of the number of offspring and the concurrent prolongation of the period of helpless infancy such as obtains amongst the higher vertebrates. Insects, like fishes, give pledges to fortune in the shape of thousands of eggs, out of which the risks of life may allow but a few to reach maturity. But the fledgling bird and the human babe are precious rarities demanding exquisite care and tenderness on the part of their mothers, who therefore must perforce learn the gentle art of love or nature is undone. As the cicada punctures the rind of a stalk depositing a column of eggs in every hole, she is followed up by a small fly which also deposits an egg in their midst, from which will emerge a grub that will feast on the eggs of the cicada. The stupid cicada cares not a jot, but goes on laying her centuries of eggs for the benefit of the larva of the fly, even as the barn-door fowl repays us for the daily rifling of her nest.

In other cases indifference to the welfare of offspring goes hand in hand with a revolting conjugal rapacity, as when the Mantid, or Praying Insect, devours her spouse, repeating the ghastly meal at every successive marriage. The Golden Scarabæus beetle of our own gardens displays the same revolting habits, besides killing other creatures, as though from mere lust of bloodshed. A female spider has been known to consume thirteen husbands in succession. Is there no essential gentleness in femininity, we ask? Moreover, when it is borne in mind that certain of these terrible gourmands are by habit vegetarians, an uncomfortable turn is given to the Ethics of Diet. Some of us have bestowed an exclusive love on the placid lettuce and the stolid nut in the hope that such viands would ultimately reduce our turbulent passions to a more suave temper. Alas! we have found the experiment futile. The vertebrate bull and the invertebrate cricket alike prove the infernal fire that lies hidden in vegetable fibre.

The study of the lives of the little people is assuredly not without its terrors; but if less kind than humanity to their own fellows, are they more cruel? Did we say that theirs is a society without pity? What, to a being as superior to man as man is to the insects, would be the impression conveyed by the sight of the nameless preventable wrongs and sufferings in our human communities? We no longer eat one another, it is true. Quite possibly cannibalism is, by social evolution, becoming eliminated from the insect world as well. There are indications of this amongst the hymenoptera. But with the cruel history of war in evidence, with man's stupid indifference to the preventable diseases and accidents that kill and maim, with the oppression of class by class, with all the selfish tyranny of human lust and greed in mind, are we sure that the verdict would not be one of amazement at the pitiless nature of man? Ours is something of a self-devouring race after all. Nature, which takes such infinite pains over the preservation and adornment of the least of creatures, has doubtless many things to teach us yet if we are prepared, like M. Fabre, to learn of the cricket and the beetle as of those more familiar social reformers, the ant and the bee.

MAZZINI.

Letters and Recollections of Mazzini. By Mrs. Hamilton King. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 5s. net.

THE Life of Mazzini still remains to be written. No one has yet succeeded in producing anything big enough to be worthy of the subject. When it sees the light it will be the portrait of a soul. Meanwhile we are grateful for every gleaning of memory by the small remaining band of those who knew and loved him, and especially for any contribution to a deeper insight into his character and spirit. This is what Mrs. Hamilton King has given us in this volume of correspondence and recollections. The historian in search of facts will turn to it in vain for anything new, except it may be in the account of Mazzini's death, as Mrs. King heard it from the lips of Madame Roselli, in May, 1876. "On the last day," she said, "he suddenly appeared to enter into some tremendous conflict with an invisible enemy. There seemed a terrible struggle against a mortal foe, with incoherent and broken words of agony. All at once, he sat up strongly in bed, and in a loud voice cried out, 'Si! Si! Credo in Dio!' and with these words, fell back and expired." But, though there may be little here which we did not know before, it helps to revive in a remarkable way the emotions of the time, the almost religious fascination which Mazzini had for many minds, and the deep wisdom with which he could, on occasion, exercise the duty of spiritual director. Since she wrote "The Disciples," Mrs. King has become a Roman Catholic, and she betrays here and there a little anxiety to soften her hero's alienation from the teaching of the Church. This weakness, if such it can be called, does not however, warp her judgment. On the subject of his religion we cannot do better than quote her own words: "He had gone through in youth a terrible crisis of desolation and dereliction of faith almost to despair, as happens to almost all the highest souls; but out of it he emerged firm and fortified. He had laid aside the formulas of any creed, and walked alone with God in a region above them. . . He had a fervent devotion to the person of Jesus Christ, without, however, I believe, recognising the Incarnation; and a particular attachment to the Apostle St. John and his writings. Some criticism having arisen as to the Fourth Gospel, and doubts as to St. John being its author, Mazzini remarked, 'Well, whoever wrote the Gospel of St. John was St. John.' " Many readers will turn the last page of this slender volume chastened and ennobled in mind, with a quickened reverence for the spiritual genius of Mazzini, and genuine gratitude to Mrs. King for this final act of homage to his memory. It explains the lyrical fervour of "The Disciples," with its convincing note of a deep and rare sincerity. She was writing there, as here, out of the most intimate affections and loyalties of her own heart.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A WORKING WOMAN. By Adelheid Popp. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.

MERELY abstract discussions on social questions often leave men cold and apathetic, and much talk about economics is apt to weary people with the best intentions to whom rent, and land-values, and the distribution of capital are not attractive subjects. It is when we are made to realise that the statistics so dear to Mr. Chiozza Money, and the budgets of the poor compiled by Mr. Rowntree, are really related to the every-day experiences of beings of flesh and blood like ourselves that we become genuinely interested, if not uncomfortable. Personal testimony is, therefore, a valuable adjunct to the sociological treatise, and this is what Frau Popp has given us in "The Autobiography of a Working Woman." To the extent to which she has taken us into her confidence regarding the circumstances of her life, and the gradual development of her mind, she has helped to throw a searching light on those confused problems which it is the duty of democracy to solve. The narrative is brief, and makes no pretensions to literary style, which indeed would not have been expected; but it is a terse and vivid piece of writing, obviously the work of a sincere and courageous woman, who found happiness in embracing Socialism after years of hardship and toil which had saddened her childhood and youth, and resulted in much physical suffering. The description of the way light came to her when she first began to learn about the views of the Social Democrats reads like the story of a religious conversion. All her latent enthusiasm for justice was awakened, and she began to subscribe to a Socialist paper with as much joy as some people experience in going to prayer-meetings after they are "saved." She used to fetch this paper every week, and the occasion was like a festival to her. "On that day I put on my best dress," she says, "as I used to do when I went to church." There is much sadness in this narrative, as is inevitable owing to the poverty which the writer has always had to struggle against, and the lack of love and tenderness, warmth and good food, in her earlier years. But it ends on a note of optimism, for the woman who can cheer herself in prison, as Frau Popp did when her outspokenness had brought her within the clutches of the law, with thoughts of a future in which children may be amply fed and educated and old people "may not go begging," is not one to be easily discouraged. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald tells us, in his Introduction, that his wife met Frau Popp at one of those International Congresses which always fill her with so much joy (the writer of this book is at the present time one of the most respected of the Socialist leaders on the Continent), and he describes her as one of those devoted women whose worn face is beautiful because it speaks "not only of physical suffering but of spiritual triumphs." A translation of August Bebel's sympathetic Introduction to the German edition is given in addition to Mr. MacDonald's at the beginning of this interesting little volume.

THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS: Gospel Readings for Children. By E. E. Read Mumford, M.A. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1s. 6d. net and 2s. 6d. net.

MANY parents and teachers will give an eager welcome to Mrs. Mumford's delightful volume of Gospel readings. It is intended for children under twelve, and the object is to present a simple and continuous narrative. For this purpose a selection has been made from the Synoptic Gospels. "Two main ideas," the writer explains, "have determined the choice and grouping of these extracts—(1) that only those passages should be chosen which are within the capacity of the young child's understanding; (2) that these should be so grouped that both the life and the teaching are capable of being realised vividly by the child." On both of these there is room for considerable difference of taste and opinion. We are not convinced that the attempt to separate the Life and the Teaching is altogether wise. It may tend to create the habit of looking at them apart, a result which we think would be disastrous from the religious point of view.

We are sorry to see the Temptation given only in Mark's compressed narrative. The narratives of Matthew and Luke are in themselves more intelligible, and may surely be regarded as belonging to the religious wonderland of childhood. Probably the decision to omit St. John's Gospel was inevitable, though we should have welcomed a few of its immortal pictures like the Woman of Samaria and the Washing of the Disciples' feet in an appendix. We should be sorry to lose them from our earliest memories. The short introduction on "How the Gospels were written" is perhaps a little too positive in tone, especially in regard to the dates of composition. Even the child can understand the difference between probabilities and certainties. Something might also have been said about a common source. Mrs. Mumford writes as though the evangelists had worked quite independently and arrived at a very remarkable agreement. A few notes for parents and teachers have been added, but they might be expanded with great advantage in some places and corrected in others. It is rather misleading to state that "Jesus" is a Greek word, similar to a Hebrew word meaning "Deliverer"; it is, of course, simply the Greek form of a Hebrew word and means "Yahveh is salvation." We are at a loss to understand the note on the "feast of the passover and of unleavened bread" (Mark xiv. 1). We are told that they represent different parts of the pass-over season, and that there was an interval of seven days between them. As a matter of fact, the Passover was sacrificed on the fourteenth Nisan before sunset, and the feast of unleavened bread began at sunset, i.e., on the fifteenth. These are small blemishes in an attractive piece of work which has been done with loving care, and they can be corrected without difficulty in a second edition. We should like to add that we are in hearty agreement with Mrs. Mumford's plea that the life of Christ should be learned first of all in the matchless words of the New Testament and not in modern Lives, which seldom escape the pitfalls of a self-conscious simplicity even when they avoid the more obvious faults of feebleness and sentimentality.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

1480-1555.

I.

"Let the righteous be glad and rejoice before God; let them also be merry and joyful."—PSALM lxxviii. 3.

Do you know why I have chosen this verse to describe the great man I am going to tell you about to-day? Because Sir Thomas More, though he was one of the wisest and best and bravest men that ever lived, was also one of the merriest. One of his enemies could find no worse thing to say of him than that he was always laughing and making jokes, which, for a Lord Chancellor of England, this man thought not as it should be. You can see if you look at a portrait of More what a kind, good, wise, and at the same time merry face it is. You cannot wonder that his wife and children and all his friends loved him, and that they sorrowed greatly when he was put to death, for, like others that I have been telling you of, he was a martyr—you will see why presently. More lived about the same time as Latimer—that is to say, he was born in Henry VII.'s reign and was 29 when Henry VIII. came to the throne. But More, unlike Latimer, was not a Protestant. He was a Catholic, though he believed that everybody ought to be free to practise their own religion in their own way. For he was a great scholar, and he had read so much of the writings of the wise old Greeks and Romans, and so many of the great books that had been written since their time, that he saw that there were many different ways of thinking, and that there was some good in all of them, so that people were wrong and foolish to say to each other, "If you don't think as I do, I'll have you put to death."

He began to be a scholar very early. He was the son of a Judge, Sir John More, and was born in London. When he was a boy he was sent into the house of a great Cardinal (one of the priests of the Roman Catholic Church) to be brought up, and there he was such a good scholar, and so bright and witty, that the Cardinal used to say to his guests when More was waiting at table (as was the custom then for boys), "This child here waiting, whosoever shall live to see it, shall prove a marvellous great man." It is told of him that he would sometimes take part in plays which were acted in the Cardinal's house, and would invent a part of his own, making it so much funnier than the part that was written, that everyone laughed, and those who were acting with him could hardly go on. After he left the Cardinal's he went to Oxford, where he made many friends, and then he became a lawyer and soon afterwards went into Parliament. Here he did a very brave thing for a young man who had his way to make. He spoke against a grant of money which the King wished to squeeze out of the people for the marriage of his daughter to the King of Scotland, and spoke so well and boldly that he brought Parliament round to his way of thinking. The King was not pleased, of course, but More never minded what anybody thought of him so long as he was doing what he felt to be right.

Soon after this Henry VII. died and Henry VIII. began to reign. He was a man who liked fun and liked plain-speaking, so long as it did not go against any of his own plans, and so for a good many years More was a great favourite of his. He made him a knight, he made him a member of the Privy Council, he sent him abroad to settle England's affairs with foreign countries, and in 1530 (i.e., when More was 50 years old) he made him Lord Chancellor—the highest post in England except that of Archbishop of Canterbury. For a long time, too, the King treated him as one of his best friends, and we read how one day Henry came down the Thames in his royal barge to More's house at Chelsea and put his arm round his neck as they walked about in the garden together after dinner.

After the King had gone, Sir Thomas More's son-in-law, Will Roper, said he did not think Henry had ever behaved in so friendly a way to anyone except Cardinal Wolsey. More answered, "I thank our Lord, son, I find his Grace my very good lord indeed, and I believe he doth as singularly favour me as any subject within this realm; howbeit, son Roper, I must tell thee I have no cause to be proud thereof, for if my head would win him a castle in France, it would not fail to go off." He knew, you see, that Henry was not to be depended upon as a friend, and he was not made vain, as so many men would have been, by the King's noticing him so much. He always thought first of serving God, and then of serving the King, and that is what brought him to his end at last, as you will see. As he was such a busy man and had so many of the country's affairs on his hands, he was obliged to spend a good deal of his time at Court, but he never liked it. He would far rather have been at home. One of his children says of him that "he tried as hard to keep out of Court as most men try to get into it." And when we read about his home, we cannot wonder, for it must have been a very pleasant place, and everyone was happy there. His house was at Chelsea, a part of London close to the Thames, but very different then from what it is now. Then it was quite in the country, and you could find all sorts of wild flowers and herbs in the lanes and fields. Sir Thomas More loved flowers, and his daughter has written about them, and also told us what herbs were good for different illnesses in very quaint language. She says:—

"Many a poor knave's Pottage would be improved, if he were skilled in the properties of the Burdock and purple Orchis, Lady's-smock, Brook lime, and Old Man's Pepper. The roots of wild Succory and Water Arrowhead might agreeably change his Lenten diet; and Glasswort afford him a pickle for his Mouthful of Salt Meat. Then, there are Cresses and Wood Sorrel to his Breakfast, and Salep for his hot Evening Mess. For his Medicine, there is Herb-twopence, that will cure a hundred Ills; Camomile, to lull a raging Tooth; and the Juice of Buttercup to clear his Head by sneezing. Vervain cureth Ague; and Crowfoot affords the least painfull of Blisters. St. Anthony's Turnip is an Emetic; Goose-grass sweetens the Blood; Woodruffe is good for the Liver, and Bind-weed hath nigh as much Virtue as the foragn Scammony; Pimpernel promoteth Laughter; and Poppy Sleep; Thyme giveth pleasant Dreams; and an Ashen Branch drives evil Spirits from the Pillow."

Then, too, the Thames looked very much prettier than it does now, when all the smoke and factories have turned it thick and muddy. In More's time it was a clear river with the blue sky reflected in it on fine days, and beautiful boats used to go up and down it belonging to the nobles and gentlemen who lived on its banks. Sir Thomas More's garden was large and shady and pretty, and came down to the edge of the water. He spent much of his spare time in it, talking with his learned friends or with his wife and children. But of these children and the lessons he taught them I must tell you more next week.

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. A. W. HUTTON.

THE Guardian of March 29 contained the following account of the life and work of the Rev. Arthur Wollaston Hutton, Rector of Bow Church, Cheapside, signed with the well-known initials W. E. A.

"Mr. Hutton's career was a remarkable one. Born in 1848, he came of an old clerical stock, and he used to say that he could count no less than five clergymen as his progenitors in the direct line. He went as a schoolboy to Cheltenham, and passed thence to Exeter College, Oxford, where he had won an open scholarship. At Oxford he threw himself with youthful ardour into the theological interests of the place, and he enjoyed the intimate friendship of Canon Liddon, who always retained a high estimate of Mr. Hutton's powers as a writer, of Dr. Bright, the learned Professor of Church History, and of Dr. King, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln. He was placed in the First Class at the examination for theological honours, being the only man of his year to whom that distinction fell.

"He was ordained on the title of a curacy at St. Barnabas', Oxford, and in 1873 he succeeded his father as Rector of Spridlington, a village about nine miles from the city of Lincoln. But after three years he found his position as a High Churchman of the Tractarian type no longer possible, and he was received into the Roman Church by Dr. Newman. He lived in the Birmingham Oratory for some seven or eight years, spending a peaceful and pleasant life. There he published a work on "The Anglican Ministry," which Dr. Newman introduced by an interesting preface. Mr. Hutton was also zealous in his work among the Roman Catholics of the district, and contributed £1,200 as a single gift to the elementary schools of the Oratory, beside advancing another sum of nearly the same amount as a loan without interest. But the peace which he found was apparent rather than real, and did not last long. In 1883 Mr. Hutton left the Oratory, destitute, or believing himself to be destitute, of any faith in the supernatural. "We shall always love you," were Newman's parting words. Quite recently Hutton broke down, overcome with emotion, as he repeated them in a paper on Newman which he read to a well-known clerical society. For a season he belonged to no church. He retained, however, his passionate desire to know the truth and that blamelessness of life which was from first to last a beautiful trait in his character. Nor was his life an idle one. He was librarian of the National Liberal Club, and wrote a short and sympathetic "Life of Cardinal Manning" (who was still living). He devoted his leisure to philanthropic work. Mr. Hutton never spared himself, and he took the utmost pains to succour anyone who appealed to him for help. At last the light broke. Speculative difficulties were not overcome, but he found the practical solution of his doubts in Christ the Son of Man and the Son of God. He was greatly assisted in this recovery of faith by the Ritschlians, and especially by Harnack. He did not care much for theology in its more technical sense. To him Christ was all in all, the revelation of God's love, binding man to man and all men to God. In 1898 he resumed his work as a clergyman of the English Church. From that time he never looked back; Christ was the centre of his faith, and he valued more and more the liberty which the Church of England affords, and its mighty power for good. He held various curacies, and also a small living in Salop.

"In 1903 the important benefice of St. Mary-le-Bow fell vacant, and the patron, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, nominated Mr. Hutton as Rector. The choice, though a bold one, was more than justified by the result. Mr. Hutton was fascinated by the historic interest of the church. He renovated it within and opened up a way for visitors to the ancient Norman crypt. He persuaded the Primate to restore the custom, intermitted for a brief space, by which the Bishops of the Southern Province were confirmed at Bow Church. The musical talent which had been a link between Cardinal Newman and himself stood him in good stead when he set himself to beautify the Sunday and week-day services of his church. He brought clergymen from all quarters and of various schools of thought to address his people, and persuaded gifted laymen to explain and plead for philanthropic works of various kinds. As many as three hundred persons, almost all of them men, gathered together at the one o'clock service. The celebration of the Milton Tercentenary was a notable event—when the then Bishop of Ripon sat side by side with Dr. Horton and Dr. Clifford. He has left a memorial of his teaching, thoroughly Christian and thoroughly liberal, in a volume of sermons which appeared in 1904 under the title "Ecclesia Discens."

"A word must be said on the beauty of his family life. He was married in 1883, and every benign and gracious influence seemed to hover round the house. This family life had its trials, for once and again the shadow of bereavement darkened the home. But none who were privileged to know the family well could fail to see the love which bound each to each, and welcomed all that was lovely and of good report. Then Mr. Hutton had a genius for friendship; he never forgot an old affection or thought himself too old for a new one. He would do more for another than that other would care to do for himself. He was genial and tolerant, and indeed with his keen sense of humour he could hardly be anything else. And now his long sufferings are over and he is at rest with God."

The Rev. W. E. Addis gave the address at the Memorial Service at Bow Church on Thursday, March 28, when a large concourse of friends from far and near revealed the strength of the personal attachments which Mr. Hutton inspired alike in religion and in other walks of life.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

Sir Henry Jones on Immanence and Individuality.

THE Provincial Assembly Lecture for 1912, the second of the series instituted last year, was delivered in the Memorial Hall, Albert Square, Manchester, by Professor Sir Henry Jones, of Glasgow, on Thursday, March 28, the subject being "The Immanence of God and the Individuality of Man." The chair was taken at 7.20 p.m. by the Rev. R. Travers Herford, B.A., President of the Assembly, who, in a few introductory words, explained that while the lecture was instituted by an Assembly representing a group of free churches in Lancashire and Cheshire, it was not intended in any way to serve denominational interests. It was intended as one of the contributions of those churches to general liberal religious thought. The large hall was well filled, a great proportion of those present not being connected with the churches of the Assembly. The lecture, which occupied an hour and a half in delivery, was followed with the closest attention and interest throughout, and was frequently punctuated by applause. It was characteristic both in manner and in matter, crisp and clear in its thought, gloriously optimistic in its outlook, and at times on fire with spiritual exultation. The lecture will be published, but, unfortunately, it is impossible to print and issue the man with the message. Those who did not hear the lecture delivered will certainly get great good from reading it, but they will not have the living personality before them, and they will miss the delightful and vivid illustrations, interpolated at so many points, whereby philosophy was made to speak in a tongue "understood of the people."

"He loved great things and thought little of himself: desiring neither fame nor influence he won the devotion of men and was a power in their lives: and seeking no disciples, he taught to many the greatness of the world and of man's mind." These words, said the lecturer, written by Professor Bradley, are inscribed on a tablet erected in the Chapel of Balliol College, Oxford, to the memory of Richard Lewis Nettleship, who was a tutor in that College for twenty-three years and who died on August 25, 1892, on Mont Blanc, in a storm of wind and snow. To have "taught to many the greatness of the world and of man's mind" seemed, at first sight, to constitute a very slender claim to be remembered of men. The doctrine was meagre. It was inadequate. It was not new. Even its truth might appear to be doubtful. Nevertheless, the phrase somehow lingered in the ear and won upon the mind. It was the modern rendering, in times which he believed, often served God without naming Him, of the conviction of His universal indwelling, and of joy in His presence which the devout knew. He had no doubt it meant that for Mr. Nettleship; for they were told that he "thought little of himself"; "desired neither power nor influence"; "sought no disciples." In him was the "amor Dei" of which Spinoza spoke, a love towards God so full and so pure as not to strive to be loved in return. Hence he had ventured to ask their attention to that remarkable inscription. It brought before them in the simplest way the subject with which they had to deal. It presented them with the actual solution of the apparent contradiction which indubitably lay at the heart of man's highest spiritual attainment. For truly the good life did somehow present itself as man's own life, and as the life of God, God dwelling within him. The greatness and might and splendour of man's individuality were at their highest when he felt that God was all and man nought, when the indwelling of God in the depths and secret places of his life was most intimate, and his whole nature was suffused with His light and love. Both theology and philosophy had found it very difficult to understand that fact. If they surveyed the reflective thought of the present day, and penetrated beneath the technical and secular language of the schools, they would find that it was engaged most of all upon the problem as to how to maintain without limiting or compromising both the immanence of God, His veritable waking within our inmost mind and will, and the individuality and freedom and responsibility of man.

The consciousness of this difficulty and the attempt to solve it constituted together one of the things which distinguished our age from all its predecessors. Our age affirmed and it would fain prove, in its behaviour and in its thought, that the world and the mind of man are twin-splendours emanating from one source and revealing the One Real. In the ages before, except during rare and short periods, the natural world and the mind of man had been held in contrast; and each of them in turn had lost its value in the presence of its opposite, while God was far away from both. As a rule, it was the mind of man, and the man's whole life, which sank into utter insignificance. He is but "a thinking reed, the most fragile of all Nature's products," Pascal had said.

But at other times, in the rarer moments of deeper reflection, it was the all-encompassing realm of nature that sank into an insubstantial pageant, as compared with man. It was true, as Pascal added, that Nature could crush men. Nor did she need to put on her armour for the task: a breath of air, a drop of water, and he dies. But even if the Universe did crush him, man was the nobler of the two. He knew that he died: but the Universe knew nothing of its advantage over him. Man's capacity for thought lifted him to another level of being. Except in relation to man Nature was a dark, unconscious mass. It was only in the medium of his mind that the great scheme became the medium of beauty and truth. Nature required his mind to possess and express her meaning; and she had no purpose apart from him. He set free her capacities and liberated her powers, and only by reference to her did man realise himself.

What man was there who had not been tossed to and fro between the sense of his own littleness and his own greatness; between the futility, shallowness, meaninglessness of life and the transcendent weight of its destiny! The whole system of Kant swung and swayed between those two alternate visions. Sense and spirit, the material world and the mind of man, natural necessity and moral freedom, the blank despair of materialism and the empty void of scepticism on the one hand, and on the other the reasoned hope of a destiny to whose spiritual splendour there were no bounds, remained for Kant opposed to one another till the evening twilight wrapped his great mind in its folds. There was a "Grand Perhaps" and nothing more. Man's mind "fallen with its weight of cares" could only stretch "Lame hands of faith, and grope, And gather dust and chaff, and faintly trust the larger hope." But the world of mind moved, no less than the world of sense, and it was carried, bearing with it its revolving seasons, into new regions of the sky. And now the supreme endeavour of master minds was to overcome the contradiction, to turn the "Perhaps" into assured faith, nay, if possible, into that demonstrated knowledge which is sustained by testimony wrung from the nature of the facts of the present life. Poets, philosophers, devout thinkers, and in these latter days men of science also, had sought to reflect the glory of the world into the mind of man, and the glory of Mind into Nature. It had been discovered, and was being slowly realised, that our predecessors separated when they should have distinguished, and sought the monotonous identity of sameness when they might possess the richer identity of harmonious system. They had turned differences into antagonism, and sought to abolish when they might have reconciled. They had divorced elements which were complementary, and which reached hands and yearned towards one another. For what was it that was crass and material, remorseless and blind? Not the natural scheme, but the empty eye-socket which remained when mind was left out, that fragment of the natural scheme which was left over after man and his spiritual potencies had been treated as foreign and alien and opposed. Man treated as an alien! Her child! Had he not waxed within her womb, and been suckled at her breasts and nursed on her knees? It was he who babbled her speech, tried to read her face, guessed her meaning, divined her purposes, and whose very soul apart from her would be empty nothingness.

They had been full of zeal for their individuality and of care for their personality, and afraid to venture out on the great deep. They had sought freedom in isolation, and found instead emptiness and weakness. They had regarded Nature and her powers as intruders, shut the self within itself and put up the shutters of the soul. What else could follow but that Nature should be void of meaning and man's soul void of content and of all power? But now they would bring them together again and see whether the self that was saturated with Nature was not more free, more potent, than the self which was called impervious; and whether the Nature which was saturated with spirit was not more real than the Nature which was crass and material. It was maintained with a confidence which was growing that sense, and the things of sense, and the whole scheme of finitude did not obscure but revealed the eternal verities. The temporal was not secular any more, nor was there anything in this wide world which was common or unclean, unless, alas! man had made it so. Was it not more than evident that the truth, the beauty which man sought, dwelt in the scheme of things in which he lived and moved and had his being?

Of Nature divorced from man, of man divorced from Nature they could not think too meanly. But link man and nature together and they would find every obdurate fact freighted full of meaning as "the star with light." Nature was the other aspect of spirit, its complement, the partner of man in the enterprise of knowledge and of every virtue. Without her the slumber of his soul could never be broken, nor his ignorance illumined by a ray. But Nature was not niggard. Her springs flowed perennially. It was our cups which were small. This new view of Nature's munificence to man and his intrinsic kinship with Nature had brought with it a new conception of the law of man's own behaviour. So long as the material world was deemed to be the mere crass and obstinate opposite of spirit, instead of finding in spirit the medium in which it both attains and reveals its highest ways of being, man's own nature was held to be corrupt. He was divided against himself in a warfare to which there could be no end so long as he moved within the world of sense and was clothed with the muddy vesture of decay. But now we discerned that the present life of man, with all its natural conditions, was in every element of it a beneficent gift, and that man himself was made not in anger but in love. And his duty in consequence wore another aspect. It was not to renounce, but to dedicate; not to immolate but to consecrate; not to destroy but to transfigure. For there was nothing in him which love for his kind, and for his God, might not make sublime, transmuting it into the means, the vehicle, the instrument, the opportunity of the larger and better life.

It remained now to re-interpret and revalue not merely sense and the things of sense, Nature and the natural elements in man, but the dark and confused domain of his will. It was easier to find God everywhere than in this region. He did not need the help of the Pluralist in order to see the apparent chaos of human history, nor of the Pessimist to make him acquainted with grief. He was speaking, and knew he was speaking, of the brief, blundering, sorrow-laden life of a being whose soul is the arena of warring passions, and the victim of foolish illusions and most vain desires. It was a petty state, all in revolt, ignorant of its own good, weak of purpose, set to maintain itself amidst powers which neither listen to his cries nor consult his weakness, and where beneficence was often veiled. He for one, however, could not admit that Order, Purpose, Reason, Law—God, was everywhere except in the mind of man. He distrusted entirely that philosophy and that theology which, in order to maintain the responsibilities of the moral life, and the possibilities of spirit, had deemed it necessary to shut God outside the human soul. Man's soul was mediated by the vast scheme in which he lived. His environment was the treasury from which he drew every item of his knowledge, and his world was the laboratory wherein he achieved his character. Sever him from his world, isolate him, call his self "impervious," let the world's waves beat around his soul as around a rock-bound island, and his mind would be dark, his will uninformed, and wholly impotent for either good or evil. We had been misinterpreting the individuality of man. Man's self was the focus in which the rays of the outer reality within which it found itself were gathered together, transmuted into living experience. His selfhood, individuality, independence, freedom, depended not on what he excluded, but on what he included. The outer world was there for him to appropriate, and apart from it he was more empty than a shadow. They spoke, when using the language of religion, of One "in whom we live and move and have our being." We would do "the works of God." "The gift of grace" was "the effectual working of His power." "The God of Peace make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is pleasing in his sight." This language, and the conditions which it expressed, were, he believed, of the essence of the religious consciousness. Deprive the religious spirit of the sense of this unity with God, a unity that is deep, real, intimate, penetrating into all the recesses of the mind and will, enveloping the finite and infinite in one flame of love, and the soul was not saved but lost; for separation from God is death.

He could not regard this indubitable testimony of the religious consciousness as false. What he was constrained to question and to deny was not the reality and the responsibilities of the individuality of man; but the view that based them on separateness and isolation. The opposition of meum and tuum did not hold in this region; nor indeed in any other part of the wide domain of life and of mind. They were not constrained to say, "If Nature's, then not man's; if man's, then not Nature's." It was not the several elements but the whole in which they clung to and held by each other which was real. And far less were they doomed to say "If God's, then not ours; if ours, then not God's." Was He not the essence of our essence and life of our life? The spiritual enterprise was an enterprise in which man risked his personality. In turning to God the soul did not merely lay this passion, or that desire, upon the altar as a burnt offering; but the whole self in all its compass, holding nothing back. "I am crucified in Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." The good life was one continuous dedication to great causes. It was the trust that mattered, not the trustee. That was what the scriptures, using their powerful metaphor, called "dying to self." It was not too strong; it represented a condition; a stage, a moment of the moral and intellectual life. The best souls, at their best, gave away the last remnant of their selfhood—in loving God they did not even desire that God should love them in return. But although this was a condition of the good life, and a moment in its history, it was not its whole history. For it was precisely when the cause counted, and the good man cared not whether he himself counted at all, that he counted most. This dying is life. Standing here man is "more than conqueror"; and he can turn round and challenge all the powers. "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Having this faith, they believed that the indwelling God sustained, enriched, liberated, enlarged the personality of man, who ventured very near to the flame that did not consume but enfolded. The individuality of man and the immanence of God were two aspects of one truth.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Birmingham: Waverley-road Church.—On Sunday evening, March 24, the George Dawson Anniversary Service was held in the Town Hall. The preacher was the Rev. Gertrude von Petzold, M.A., who took for her subject "George Dawson and his message: Do we need it to-day?" The Hall was filled in every part, and hundreds were turned away. The preacher pointed out that it was for freedom for which George Dawson fought, and for which he suffered; that all the great souls of humanity from Martin Luther to the present day rebelled against an outward authority; that religion was a matter for the heart and soul of man. George Dawson was greatest as a man of prayer; his were prayers to break the heart; "such are the prayers that you and I need to-day," said the preacher. Humanity was growing tired of sectarianism, and the time was drawing near when the great ideal of George Dawson's universal Church of Christ would be realised, when we shall be willing to put off all denominational prejudices.

Bolton: The late Mr. Thomas Harwood.—The following address was given at the close of the afternoon school, Bank-street, Bolton, on March 31, by Mr. Arthur H. Hardman, one of the superintendents:—"I am sure you will not wish to separate this afternoon without some words from this desk in reference to the death of Mr. Thomas Harwood; and yet I am deeply conscious of the fact that no words of mine can adequately express the thoughts which are in your minds and in my own. This school has suffered a great loss; how great it is not yet possible for us to realise. It will only be with the passing of time, when we have felt the want of his kindly interest, his thoughtful advice, and his genuine sympathy with all the various activities of our school, that we shall know how great a friend has been taken from us. But we will not dwell—somewhat selfishly—upon our own loss. Great as it is, there are those to whom the removal of his kindly presence is a still greater loss; and to them we would tender our most heartfelt sympathy in their bereavement. My object in speaking to you this afternoon is rather to try to express our feeling of reverence for a good and great man; to express our sense of gratitude for the privilege of having known so true a gentleman. Most men love their children. For those children they reserve all that is best and noblest in their own natures. He, having no children, gave freely of his great heart and great mind to many causes; but the greatest share of them both he gave to this school. There are those here who, being fatherless, could tell that in him they found that kindly interest and personal sympathy which they thought that only a father could bestow. For his interest in this school was no mere mechanical interest—attending its meetings, conducting its services, and keeping its records—though he did those things faithfully and well for close upon forty years of his life. It was a living interest in all those who are associated with this place. Up to a few years ago he knew personally every living member of this school, past and present; and knew them so well that in times of stress and trouble he could freely offer that which he was always ready to give, his generous assistance and his helpful advice. To the older ones amongst us he was the channel through which all the past wisdom of our school and all its great traditions were conveyed. We sometimes, young and old alike, ask ourselves what is the motive of this place; why it is that we meet here week after week, and what it all means? He, perhaps more than any other man, represented the spirit of this place; to know him was to understand it all. But it is not easy in these few minutes to do justice to his character. Of a lesser man it would be easy to say more, ticking off his virtues one by one. But his character was too great, too many-sided, for any poor human words to adequately describe. In this school which he loved so well, at the close of this service which he conducted for so many years, we would in our hearts feel a silent reverence for this good man, and a deep sense of gratitude for all the kindly thoughts and deeds which he scattered abroad with so lavish a hand. Surely the best tribute to his memory would be that we should strive more faithfully to attain that ideal of which he was the living example. Let us see to it, in remembrance of him, that we do no mean or paltry act which would have given him pain."

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Chapel.—In connection with the Sunday schools an interesting dedicatory service was held in the chapel on Sunday afternoon last. The scholars assembled in the chapel at 3 o'clock, when a devotional service was conducted by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., who was supported by Mr. J. T. Underhill, at present acting as congregational treasurer, and Mr. H. S. Bunce, a member of the Congregational Committee. Six members of the Sunday schools, having expressed their desire to be recognised as members of the Lewin's Mead congregation, were addressed by the minister. They were reminded of the responsibilities attaching to association with their old religious home, the good name of which was more or less delivered into their solemn keeping. They were bidden to remember the life of integrity, of self-respect, and of unselfishness toward others, which the principles they had imbibed at Lewin's Mead would surely help them to lead. They were reminded of the justly honoured men and women who, in times past, had been associated with their old house of prayer, and they were urged to make their career worthy of such high examples, the minister desiring that each of them would never scruple to ask his advice and counsel, and assuring them of his affectionate interest in their welfare. On behalf of the congregation a cordial welcome to the church was given to the young members, by Mr. H. S. Bunce, who in an appropriate and earnest address appealed to them for a careful study of the religious principles and doctrines for which Lewin's Mead stood. Mr. J. T. Underhill, on behalf of the Congregational Committee, presented each of the new members with a copy of the recently published "Lewin's Mead Hymnal," and wished them happiness in the sacred association into which they had that day so seriously entered. At the request of the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, he then distributed the Sunday school prizes to those who had earned them. An interesting and impressive service was then brought to a close.

Chelmsford.—During the past eleven weeks the congregation of Legg-street Chapel have been holding services on Sunday evenings in the Picture Palace, the use of which has been kindly granted free of cost by Mr. A. R. P. Hickley. The experiment has met with a fair measure of success. The first seven services were conducted by ministers, including the Revs. J. Morgan Whiteman, J. A. Pearson, W. H. Drummond, T. P. Spedding (twice), A. H. Biggs, and Charles Roper; and the last four by lay preachers from Ilford. At the first service the attendance was 200, and once later the same figure was reached; the other services were attended by numbers ranging from 50 to 175, the average being about 100, and rather more than that number was present at the concluding service last Sunday. Next Sunday the congregation return to the chapel in Legg-street. It is believed that much good has been done by the mission, and it is hoped that it may result in an access of strength and religious energy to the congregation.

Glasgow.—The annual business meeting of the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church was held on Sunday, March 31, after the morning service. The chairman, Mr. T. M. Semple, drew attention to the satisfactory state of the Church finances and submitted the annual report, which was adopted without amendment.

Hackney: New Gravel Pit Church.—The last of an interesting course of lectures on "Leaders of Religion" (dealing with John Wycliffe, Sir Thomas More, John Knox, George Fox, John Bunyan, Richard Baxter, and John Wesley) by the Rev. Bertram Lister was given on Tuesday, March 26. The lectures, which have been well attended, were illustrated by lantern slides.

Ilford.—The Literary Society closed the most successful season of its existence with a business meeting and social evening, at which Mr. G. H. Snow (hon. secretary) reported a record membership and a small balance in hand, after defraying all expenses. The Girls' Guild, which, under the direction of Miss Keeler (secretary of the Ilford branch of the Women's League), devotes its energies to work on behalf of John Pound's Home at Portsmouth, has also had a prosperous season, the end of which was marked by an entertainment given by members of the Guild in the schoolroom, on Saturday, March 30, when a profit of £2 10s. was realised, and a social evening last Monday. On Wednesday a farewell meeting was held to take leave of Mr. Edwin Hoskins, who is going to Australia. Mr. Hoskins has done excellent work in the Sunday school and in other ways, and the Church united in presenting him with a parting gift in token of their esteem and in appreciation of his services. Three more members of the church have just joined the Ilford band of lay preachers, and will share in the work of supplying the pulpit at Chelmsford.

Kidderminster.—The Monthly Record of the New Meeting House contains the following interesting announcement:—"All readers of the Record, all members and adherents of the New Meeting congregation, all our friends in distant parts of the world, will join in congratulating Col. and Mrs. W. H. Talbot on the occasion of their golden wedding. The fiftieth anniversary of their marriage falls on April 24, and we all give them our heartiest good wishes for many years of happy united life still to come, and every blessing, until their lives' end. Col. Talbot and his family have rendered great and notable services to our church and our congregation. The Records of past years tell of the good work done by Mrs. William Talbot, Miss Talbot (now Mrs. Kitson, of Leeds), and Col. Talbot has acted as the genial President of the Church Committee for a considerable number of years. In addition to this, his services as Treasurer of the New Hall Building Fund have been invaluable, and were a great aid in bringing that work to a successful issue. We all appreciate his loyalty to our cause and our church, and all he has done for us, and congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Talbot on this happy jubilee."

Leeds: Mill-hill Chapel.—The annual exhibition of the Leeds Association of Girls Clubs was held at the Albert Hall in March. Eighteen clubs took part in the competitions, the Mill-hill Club winning the shield of merit for the fourth time in succession, and more than 20 other distinctions. The Hunslet Club took the Morris Dance Trophy, and for the second time the Sirging Shield. The Rev. F. Wrigley, B.A., joint minister of Salem Congregational Church, Leeds, officiated at the evening service in Mill-hill Chapel, on Sunday, March 31, taking as his subject "The Reality of the Unseen World." The collections were in aid of the Leeds Distress Fund, and realised about £70, a figure which would have been larger had not many of the congregation given already to the fund.

London: Essex Church.—The Essex Church calendar for April contains an account of the work of Lindsey, Raikes, and other originators of Sunday schools, with several illustrations, by the Rev. F. K. Freeston.

London: Hampstead.—On June 5 it will be 50 years since Rosslyn-hill Chapel was opened for public worship. It has been decided to hold a special celebration of this jubilee. On Sunday June 2, Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, U.S.A., will preach in the morning. A special congregational meeting will be held probably on June 5, when former members and their descendants will be invited. Details of the arrangements will be announced later.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—An interesting and very successful experiment was made by the Union on Monday, April 1, when a joint conference was held with the Lay preachers of the Liberal Christian League. The chair was taken by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., who, in offering on behalf of the Unitarian preachers a very cordial welcome to their visitors, spoke of the sympathy with which Unitarians regarded the growth of liberal ideas in all religious bodies. He also emphasised the duty of religious Liberals to try to make their principles effective in social and political life. The conference was then opened by the secretaries of the two Unions, Mr. T. H. Ashelford and Mr. W. T. Colyer, who propounded answers to the question, "What has Liberal Christianity to offer to the World?" Mr. Ashelford dwelt upon the duty of Liberal Christians to insist on the truth that life is "worth while," and mentioned the support which this idea found in the writings of such men as Bergson and Eucken. Liberal Christianity offered the world a re-interpretation of the Bible in the light of modern knowledge; and a new presentation of the life of Jesus in terms of the Divine Immanence. We had to proclaim the immediate realisation of God by the individual soul which is willing to practise the method of obedience and sacrifice, as did Jesus. Mr. Colyer said that Liberal Christianity did not offer to the world a new orthodoxy in substitution for the old. Its gifts to the world did not take the form of doctrinal statements, but of an attitude of mind. It aroused in the hearts of men the spirit of the little child, its iconoclasm, its disregard of conventions, its persistence in awkward questions and its refusal to be put off with stock answers. It insisted also, with Jesus, upon the dignity of each individual man and upon the brotherhood of all men. Thus it offered to the world social, political, and personal revolution—but a revolution towards righteousness. The following took part in the very interesting discussion which followed:—Messrs. T. Wilkes Smith, F. Talbot, Wainwright, Miss Knight, Mr. Beckwith, Miss Alleyne, Mr. Emery, Miss Amy Withall, and Messrs. Franklyn and Sorensen. The meeting closed with a short speech by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, who had succeeded Mr. Chancellor in the chair when the latter had to return to the House of Commons.

London: Women's Social Club.—The third annual girls' drill competition and display, organised by the Women's Social Club, took place at Caxton Hall on Saturday evening, March 30, before a large audience. For the junior competition (girls under 14) five teams were entered. The shield was awarded to the team from Portland Institute, and the others were placed in the following order:—Bell-street Mission, last year's winners, second; Unity Club (Kilburn), third; Essex Church, fourth; and Durning Hall, fifth. In the senior competition (girls over 14) Unity Club (Kilburn) again carried off the shield, which they had held for the last year, Portland Institute came second, then followed Bell-street, Mansford-street, Rhyl-street, and Essex Church. The different teams gave a varied display of fancy marching, country dances, dumb-bell and other exercises; and the junior teams were specially commended by the judge Miss M. Bryan, M.B.C.P.E.

Mansfield.—The annual meeting of the Old Meeting congregation was held on Monday, March 25. The Chapelwarden's report, which was presented and adopted, showed that the deficit with which the year started had been considerably reduced. Mr. C. J. Vallance was re-elected chapelwarden, and Mr. B. Royce secretary. The committee and sidesmen were also re-elected.

Mexborough.—The inauguration of the new Free Christian Church at Mexborough took place on Thursday, March 28, when nearly 400 people were present at the tea, and the public meeting which was held afterwards was largely attended. The Lord Mayor of Sheffield, Mr. A. J. Hobson, presided, and addresses were given by the Revs. T. Anderson, A. H. Dolphin, C. J. Street, and Mr. W. Laycock, Sheffield. The Lord Mayor said that the founding of a Free Christian Church there had been a matter of great difficulty owing to the severance of old associations and of personal friendship. Such severances were painful matters and led to a lot of bitterness of feeling, but there had been no difference of feeling on that question in the foundation of the church. He hoped that the very excellent spirit which had been manifested between organisations with which the Rev. T. Anderson was connected, and those who had followed him, would continue. The essence of the matter was that it was not so much what a man believed that mattered, but what the man was and what he did. He hoped they would help Mr. Anderson to build up a cause there that would be strong enough to stand alone and continue successfully, even if he were taken from it. It was a time of great stress and difficulty, not only for them at Mexborough, but for every one in the country, but it was a noticeable fact that the greatest things that had been done in history had been mostly done in exceedingly troublous times. He hoped they would continue to prosper, and that they would have the supreme satisfaction of seeing a strong cause grow there and also at Bolton. The congregation meets, at present, in the West-street Hall, which is crowded every Sunday evening. The morning service is also well attended, and the Sunday scholars number over a hundred. The new church at Bolton-on-Dearne, which is only two miles away, also records excellent progress, but the distress caused in the neighbourhood by the strike is very great. A small fund has been raised for the purpose of giving the Sunday school children a meal three times a week.

Newport, Mon.—The two concluding meetings of the Social Union in connection with the Charles-street Unitarian Church took the form of social gatherings and lantern talks. One was a lecture by the Rev. A. H. Anderson, B.A., Liberal Congregational minister, on the "Religious Significance of the Art of Dante Gabriel Rossetti"; the other, an account of his experiences in the Cape by the minister, the Rev. J. Tyssul-Davis, B.A. A class which has met weekly for the study of the works of Dante, including several outside members, has had a very successful session.

Nottingham: The High Pavement Chapel. Presentation.—On Friday, March 29, a combined meeting of the High Pavement Church and of the Sunday School was held to bid farewell to Miss Helen L. Phillips, who is giving up her work as assistant at the High Pavement prior to taking up the ministry of Christ Church, Nottingham, and Ilkeston. The chair was taken by Mr. H. T. Facon, B.A., chairman of the Council; and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, on behalf of the Church, and as expressing their affection and gratitude, presented Miss Phillips with a beautiful gold watch and chain, and a Bible—"symbols of Time and Eternity," he called them. On behalf of the Sewing Meeting he also presented her with a purse-bag. Mr. J. C. Warren, M.A., on behalf of the Sunday School, made a happy speech and presented Miss Phillips with a handsome arm-chair, and Miss H. Guilford, also speaking for the school, gave her an exquisite bouquet of flowers. Miss Phillips, who has served the High Pavement Church and School for nearly eight years, was enthusiastically received on rising to offer her thanks. The warmest good wishes accompany her in her new work.

Stockton-on-Tees: Wellington-street Church.—A largely attended social gathering was held at the Unitarian school-room on Monday evening, April 1, when a testimonial and address from the members of the congregation and Sunday school were presented to the Rev. R. H. Maister, who has just terminated his seven years' ministry at Stockton. The address was presented by Mr. W. J. Watson, J.P., who spoke in appreciative terms of Mr. Maister's faithful service, and the esteem and affection in which he is held by his people and scholars alike.

THE Rev. Dr. C. W. Wendte is now in London, where, along with Mrs. Wendte, he will spend a few days before returning to America. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has arranged for a meeting at Essex Hall on Thursday, April 11, at 8 p.m., when Dr. Wendte will tell about his recent travels in Italy, Egypt, Palestine, and Turkey, and his intercourse with representative liberal religious thinkers and workers. All who can make it convenient to attend are invited.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

CITY CHILDREN IN THE COUNTRY.

The following extracts from children's letters are taken from an article by Mrs. Barnett, entitled "The Children's Country Holiday Fun," in the Cornhill Magazine for April:—

The animals gave great pleasure and created wonder, variously expressed as follows:—

The cows made a grunting noise, the baa lambs made a pretty little shriek.

The cows I saw were lazy, they were laying. One was a bull who I daresay had been tossing somebody.

I heard a bird chirping it was make a noise like chirp chirp twee.

I saw a big dragon fly. It was like a long caterpillar with long sparkling transparent wings.

The birds are not like ourn they are light brown.

There were wasps which was yellow and pretty but unkind.

I (aged eleven) saw a little blackbird—its head was off by a Cat. I made a dear little grave and so berreyed it under the Tree.

The flowers, of course, came in for the greatest attention, and after them the trees are most usually referred to:

I (aged nine) know all the flowers that lived in the garden, but not all those who lived in the field.

Stinging nettles are a nuisance to people who have holes in their boots.

The Pond is all covered with Rushes. These had flowers like a rusty poker.

I picked lots of flowers and always brought them home (showing the influence of the Selborne Society in teaching children not to pick and throw away what is alive and growing).

The Cuckoo dines on other birds.

There was one bird called the squirrel.

Only gentlemen are allowed to shoot pheasants as they are expensive.

We caught fish in the river some were small others about 2 feet long.

Butterflies dont do much work.

The trunk of the oak is used for constructing furniture, coffins, and other expensive objects.

MISS VIDA SCUDDER AND AMERICAN STRIKERS.

According to the Christian Register a storm of protest has followed the recent action of Miss Vida Scudder, whose book "Socialism and Character" has just been published by Messrs. Dent & Sons, in addressing an audience of strikers at Lawrence, U.S.A. The speech she made has, it appears, been misreported in the various newspapers, and was in reality of such a pacific character that it may well be asked why it has aroused such violent indignation. Mr. Graham Brooks, writing about it in the Boston Transcript, says that "from its first to final word it was a kind of passionate beseeching to the audience for ethical self-restraint," and he himself wondered as he heard it how such an appeal could have any effective uses for the particular audience Miss Scudder was addressing. The following is an extract from the speech which has caused so much trouble:—"Let us see to it that all our suffering be indeed for justice, for righteousness' sake. Riot, even under severest provocation, does not make for justice. See to it, you citizens, that you keep an impartial mind, quick to compassion, free from prejudice, divorced from all apathy and irresponsibility, for a great trust is yours. And see to it, you strikers, . . . that you hold your task too sacred to be defended by low, dishonourable, or violent means."

THE PUBLIC ELEMENTARY SCHOOL OF TO-DAY.

The report of the Board of Education on the work done in the year 1910-11 which has just been issued contains an interesting passage on the relation between the child's life in the school of to-day and his life out of the school. These are being brought into closer touch, and the barrier which tradition has erected between the two is being broken down. "Education is less 'bookish' and more practical than it was. In almost every subject in the curriculum, in English and arithmetic hardly less than in nature study and geography, the teacher of to-day uses the materials and experiences with which the children are familiar in every-day life. These materials and experiences vary with the locality in which the school is placed and with the probable occupations and interests of the children in days to come. Hence follow the increasing difference between schools in one area and those in another, especially between town and country schools, and the growing divergence, after a certain stage, between the education of the boy and that of the girl. At the same time the influence of the school is spreading more and more widely over the sphere of the child's interests and activities. The school concerns itself with his bodily as well as with his mental and moral development, with his amusements as well as with his labours; it teaches him to use his hands as well as his head, to play as well as to work."

THE SOLUTION OF A PROBLEM.

The Westminster Gazette is responsible for the following story. A lady missionary was taking tea with a mandarin's wives. The Chinese ladies examined her clothing, her hair, her teeth, and so on, but her feet especially amazed them. "Why," cried one, "you can walk and run as well as a man!" "Yes, to be sure," said the missionary. "Can you ride a horse and swim, too?" "Yes." "Then you must be as strong as a man!" "I am." "And you wouldn't let a man beat you—not even if he was your husband—would you?" "Indeed I wouldn't," the missionary said. The mandarin's wives looked at one another, nodding their heads. Then the oldest said softly: "Now I understand why the foreign devil never has more than one wife. He is afraid!"

THE HUMANITARIAN LEAGUE.

The annual report of the Humanitarian League, presented on the occasion of the annual meeting at the Westminster Palace Hotel (March 29) is a record of continued activity on various lines, especially for the reform of the criminal law and prison system, and the prevention of cruelty in sport. Attention is drawn to the need of amending the Vagrancy Act, an old statute which still permits the use of the lash for trivial offences. Regret is expressed that facilities could not be found for the Spurious Sports Bill, which would prohibit, together with rabbit coursing and pigeon shooting, what the late Home Secretary described as "the painful and repulsive incidents" of the carted deer hunt. The League's influence is being extended by the formation of local branches in Manchester, Glasgow, Sheffield, Croydon, and other places.

DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

The famine in Russia, which has continued for about four months, is said to be affecting no less than thirty millions of the population in European Russia and Siberia. This appalling calamity is due to last year's drought, and the consequent failure of the harvest. Mr. Wright Brooks, who had some considerable experience twenty years ago in administering the sum of £40,000 raised by the Society of Friends to alleviate the distress in Russia at that time, recently gave some facts relating to the present famine to a representative of the Daily News. "Owing," he said, "to the primitive methods of agriculture and the absence of means of irrigation, a large part of Central Russia is always liable to scarcity. During the last famine the Russian Government did not oppose private efforts of relief, but though it seems almost incredible, on this occasion they have forbidden such efforts. Nevertheless, the benevolent public have done and are doing their best for the people, in defiance of the Government. . . The efforts made to deal with the famine are inefficient, and private relief is essential. I am quite sure that anything that can be done in this country to assist will be deeply appreciated by the people. I have during the past three months been sending out what funds I could obtain, but I should like to see something done on a considerable scale."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

THE ANNUAL MEETING will be held in the Church of the Messiah, Congregational Room, Birmingham, on Wednesday, April 17, at 5.30 p.m. Tea at 4.45.

The Chair will be taken by the President, J. F. L. BRUNNER, Esq., M.P., supported by Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and others.

In connection with the Annual Meeting, there will be held in the Lower Schoolroom of the Church of the Messiah an Exhibition of Social Need and Social Service. It is designed as a survey of the work awaiting men and women in the service of the nation, and particularly of the nation's poor.

The exhibit is divided into four courts—
(1) Physical need and the promotion of health.
(2) Industrial need and industrial betterment.
(3) Social and charitable work.
(4) Social study.

The Exhibition, to which there is no charge of admission, will be open on Wednesday and Thursday afternoons from 1 to 6 o'clock, and Miss LUCY GARDNER, Hon. Sec. of the Inter-denominational Conference of Social Service Unions, will attend to explain the exhibits.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE great Coal Strike came formally to an end last Saturday, though the resumption of work has been delayed by the holiday season and local circumstances. At a meeting of the Miners' Federation, the following resolution was submitted on behalf of the Executive Committee :—

"Seeing that there is no provision in the rules or regulations of the Federation to guide this Committee as to the majority required to continue the strike, except the resolution passed at the Conference held December 21, 1911, that a two-thirds majority was required to declare a national strike, we agree that the same majority be required to continue the strike, and seeing that a two-thirds majority vote is not in favour of the continuance of the strike, and acting upon that vote, we advise the resumption of work."

After prolonged discussion the resolution was carried, it is stated by 140,000 votes to 125,000 votes—a majority of 315,000, and official instructions were issued for a resumption of work. The great mass of the nation will now demand that further negotiations shall be conducted on both sides in a spirit of fairness and conciliation; and that no attempt shall be made anywhere to penalise any of the men. These are essential conditions for an honourable peace.

A MEMORANDUM has been published on the subject of Presbyterian reunion in Scotland as the result of recent conferences between committees representing the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church. The crux of the difficulty lies not in doctrine but in the question of establishment and the undefined territory of sentiment and historical memories. A certain measure of agreement has been arrived at. Both Churches, it is stated, have accepted the principle that in matters spiritual the Church shall be free from external authority. On the question of endowments, the Church of Scotland lays down the position that they are not to be secularised; but granted this principle, the details of the manner in which the ancient endowments are to be dealt with under the new conditions must be entrusted to a strong and sympathetic Parliamentary Commission.

ONE of the most important clauses in the Memorandum, as illustrating the conciliatory temper in which the whole subject has been approached, runs as follows :—

"The position of other Churches is not prejudiced by these negotiations. The Church of Scotland has expressed her sympathy with the suggestion that these Churches might be given an improved status in the eye of the law, and beyond that it is not easy to advance by way of seeking any changes as regards these Churches which they are not at present seeking for themselves. But, on the other hand, one of the obstacles to union is the view that exclusive recognition of a national Church infers positive injury to all other Churches by depressing their position in the eye of the law. There are expressions in some of the statutes which give colour to this argument, and it seems desirable to endeavour to meet it, if not by positive legislation for these Churches at all events by a statutory disclaimer of any exclusive claim of the Church of Scotland to recognition by the State in Scotland as a Christian Church."

* * *

A LETTER of protest against the Government proposals for Welsh Disestablishment has been issued, signed by a group of Churchmen who in other respects are strong Liberals in politics. It can hardly be said that it advances any new arguments, or even states those which are familiar already in a more cogent form. There is an attempt to plead that the mind of Wales on this subject is not really known, and that Disestablishment must tend to remove from among the people the one person whose presence even in the poorest part of our great cities is almost always an elevating influence in their midst. But the strongest feeling has evidently been aroused by the proposals for disendowment, and the diversion of ancient endowments to other than distinctly religious purposes.

A REPLY by the Bishop of Hereford to this letter of protest was published in the Times on Wednesday. He expresses his sympathy with the objection to secularising endowments given and used for religious purposes, and his hope that the Bill may meet it in some degree; but on the whole question he stands quite firm. He maintains that the Welsh have as much claim as the Scotch or the Irish to regulate what concerns their own religious life. "Those Churchmen," he writes, "who consider the matter dispassionately, whether they be Liberal or Conservative, will, I trust, agree in regard to Disestablishment that as Churchmen in Wales are, on the most liberal computation, not more than one-third of the whole people, they can no longer be maintained in their privileged position against the will of the majority without perpetuating a feeling of grave injustice, which must be permanently detrimental to the general well-being. And on the question of dis-endowment it has to be borne in mind that nothing will be taken away from the Church except ancient endowments which were originally given when the Church included the whole community, and consequently they belong to the whole community. Seeing, then, that they have come down to us as a national trust for the good of all, in which all have an equal right to share, it cannot be just that they should continue to be monopolised by a minority of one-third, and it becomes the duty of Parliament to make an equitable readjustment."

* * *

At the annual Conference of the National Union of Teachers held at Hull, on Easter Monday, the Archbishop of York made an earnest plea for the raising of the school age in the interests of more efficient education. No form of Government, he said, made greater demands than democracy upon the high average intelligence and capacity of each individual citizen. We might look forward with hope to the future of our country if we could be sure that an increasing number of our people were educated persons. We were wasting a great amount of public money, and of educational efficiency, by closing the school life of children where it was closed at present. Public opinion must make up its mind that it must retain some hold on the advancing intelligence of every boy and girl up to sixteen, seventeen, or eighteen years of age.

* * *

In the course of his address the new President of the Teachers' Union, Mr. W. D. Bentliff, spoke in strong terms of the educational inefficiency produced by the present dual system of provided and non-provided schools, and the gross unfairness to the teaching profession that service and preferment should depend in many cases not upon efficiency and skill but upon theological opinion. The present system, he said, was tolerated in order to provide for the continued denominational religious instruction of children whose parents in the very vast majority of cases had not asked for it, were not keen on it, and would view its discontinuance in the schools with indifference. He had had a long experience in the admission of children to provided schools; he had admitted thousands, but he had never heard a parent complain of having to enter children in such a school and he had never heard an expression of regret at their statutory inability to provide definite denominational religious instruction. The truth was that enthusiasts had built an inverted pyramid of fiction on a pin point of fact.

CONTINUING, Mr. Bentliff expressed a strong opinion against permission to contract out of the national system, the payment of public money where there was not full popular control, and the right of entry into the present provided schools. "Let those in authority recognise that what the parents are anxious about," he said, "is not denominational religious instruction but the retention of the Bible in the schools. I am voicing the opinion of the members of this great Union in saying here and now that the Bible must be kept in the schools. If that is done, if we are allowed to teach the truths therein contained, truths which are accepted by every denomination which founds its creed on the Bible, then, speaking for myself and I hope for the very great majority of teachers in this country, I say that, so far as the day schools are concerned, denominational instruction may go."

* * *

THE annual meeting of the National Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen and Clerks has been held in London this week. Its proceedings deserve far more attention on the part of the public than they usually receive. Labour in shops is long and exhausting, and a great deal of the smooth working of the social machine depends upon the courtesy and good temper with which it is done. From the nature of the case concerted action in order to secure better remuneration and more healthy conditions is beset with unusual difficulties. For many years vigorous protests have been made against the hardships of the living-in system, but so far with lamentably small results. This week it was decided to prosecute the campaign against it with renewed vigour, and the Executive of the Union was instructed to endeavour to secure the inclusion of shop workers in the lists of trades to which the Truck Act applies.

* * *

In a recent article in the Methodist Recorder, Professor J. H. Moulton deals with the deeply interesting problem of the difficulties created for evangelical zeal by widening culture and a capacity for seeing both sides of a question. These difficulties, he maintains, are incident to a transition period when old motives have failed and the new outlook and the new motives for evangelism have not been grasped with sufficient force to make them effective. It is true that the motive that used to account for so much—the motive akin to that of the fireman getting people out of a burning house—does not work to-day as it used to do, but a greater motive is coming more and more to the fore—namely, the call of Christ to the transformation of the world, a positive motive instead of a negative one, the call of gratitude and love, and everything that is best and highest in man. In other words, the prevailing motive in the future is to be a desire to share rather than a desire to rescue.

It is significant that Canon Scott Holland's organ, the Commonwealth, has expressed itself strongly in favour of Divinity degrees at Oxford and Cambridge being thrown open to all comers. It is rightly regarded as the natural corollary of the opening of the Universities to every member of the nation who can make use of their resources of knowledge. Such a University, it is agreed, cannot undertake to act on behalf of any one particular religious body. Its degrees in Divinity and the Examinerships in the Divinity School must be open to all who can approve themselves to the University as having attained to a certain scientific standard of knowledge in this special department of human experience.

* * *

THE Commonwealth maintains that this is not in the least inconsistent with Confessional Instruction:—"The Professors and Lecturers will give instruction in whatever matters belong to the subject: and they can do this in full and free regard to the Creed professed by the Body to which they individually belong. The Anglican Chairs will expound the Anglican position. The Roman, the Congregationalist, the Unitarian, will declare their own reasoned convictions. The student of Comparative Religion will say his say. There will be no hampering of denominational instruction. Only, the Examination in the School and for the Degree will have but one standard to apply to all the work brought before it—the standard of intellectual efficiency."

* * *

FINALLY, the Commonwealth argues that this surrender of an exclusive privilege will be of distinct advantage to the Church of England. "It will clear the air of all subterfuges, and the stage of all vexatious preferences. It will rescue the Church of England from the odium of special privileges, and from the very doubtful position of having her representative exponents certified for her by a Body that has ceased to be qualified for the responsibility. It will be helpful all round if the Church itself volunteers to get rid of the limitations which, while doing it no honour, exclude others who have, on the intellectual side, as good a right to win a University recognition as any of those whom the Church can produce."

NUMEROUS correspondents have written to point out that the stanzas which we printed last week are taken from William Watson's poem, "The Unknown God." Mr. Jonathan Nield asks us to express his regret that they appeared with some errors due to the incorrectness of the source from which he quoted them.

THE GREAT OCCASION.

It is very doubtful whether our plethora of meetings is very congenial to the fruits of the Spirit. Listening to endless speeches about religion may be only one degree better than making them. The rapid growth and multiplication of meetings dedicated to some religious object, so far from being favourable to the best interests of religion, has the tendency to immerse us in fussiness and to make us lovers of noise or notoriety, when for our souls' sake we should study to be quiet. Organised Christianity, at least as we know it in our own land and read about it in our newspapers, is not free from the danger of sinking into mechanism, and the clever organiser is almost more honoured than the prophet. Endless committees spend weary hours in trying to introduce some attractive novelties into stale programmes, and the speakers with a platform reputation talk volubly about matters which no man can touch safely except in an atmosphere of reverence and awe. The result is that the same people sit on the chairs listening, but hardly expectant, while the mass of men and women, who still value public worship and the religious fellowship of the church, abstain altogether and are quite unconscious of any loss either in the range of their interests or the intensity of their spiritual life. The suspicion, we fear, is not groundless that our public speaking about religion is becoming conventional and commonplace. How should it be otherwise when it is a commodity in which there is such a terrible over-supply, and the speakers themselves are compelled to come to their task without the needful discipline of long silences? EMERSON did well to remind us of the saying of EURIPIDES that "ZEUS hates busy-bodies and those who do too much."

In saying this we do not wish to imply that all meetings are of the kind we have described or to inaugurate an anti-social campaign. We believe intensely in the spirit of fellowship, and we desire to preserve unspoiled the honour and glory of great occasions. We deplore a great deal of the fussiness of modern religion partly for this very reason, that it tends to fritter away the energies and exhaust the powers of enjoyment, which we should bring fresh and unimpaired to the great occasion. We ought to be able to go up to keep the feast with our brethren with gladness of heart, eager to join in the memorial acts of our religion and to enrich our own life by taking sweet counsel together. But it is hard to do this if we are already the victims of spiritual fatigue, overworked not through the travail of our souls, but by incessant meetings and committees. We must beware lest we become staled by custom in religion, and sacrifice to needless activities the faculty of a divine surprise. The great occasion, with all its capacities for good, would be far greater in our eyes, if the edge of our eagerness were not dulled by the crowd of minor competitors and more space were allowed for the growth of the quieter graces and virtues.

For the great occasion, whatever opportunities it may afford for conference upon plans of work, should be chiefly a time of refreshing, when men feel the closeness of their fellowship in the spiritual acquisitions of life and the vision of the kingdom of God. For this reason worship rather than discussion will be its keynote. In argument men often fall asunder and intensify their feeling of loneliness, but when they share the experience that has come to them in hours of deep meditation or the daily efforts of Christian discipleship, the barriers fall away and the confession of brotherhood, which had formerly lingered on their lips, becomes a transfiguring force in their lives. The full privileges of fellowship are only open to those who have learned to escape from the snares of religious rhetoric and the pedantry of logical victories into the deeper experiences of the Christian soul, its thirst for God, and the answer of God to its need. And for this reason the great occasion cannot be rightly used except by men who bring to it the unwearied energies of faith and hearts fresh and simple enough to feel, and not merely to discuss, the oneness of God and man.

At a time like the present there is perhaps a little unnecessary eagerness to give special prominence on the religious programme to the intellectual difficulties of belief or the newest view of truth. In our moods of mental restlessness we spend our time in seeing or hearing some new thing, and we almost persuade ourselves that the people who can trumpet fresh religious wares loudest will bring the world flocking to their side. But as a rule the world turns a deaf ear to such resounding appeals, and prefers the voice that pleads with it on behalf of CHRIST to all the newest philosophies. In this it may be it reveals not its prejudice against novelties, but a healthy preference for a mellowed spiritual wisdom. The long toil of thought must go on from age to age, and little by little the Church must absorb its results into the intellectual substance of its faith. But this process can only go on healthily, when in a very real way the Church lives above it, moulding the new thought into conformity with its own experience. It is no sign of spiritual health to cultivate the open mind at the expense of the loyalties of the will, or to give greater prominence to the problems of thought than to the achievements of faith. The great occasion, in so far as it is a glad festival of religious fellowship, will give the first place to these achievements of faith which it is its chief business to rehearse and celebrate. It will recognise, and this knowledge will control all its activities and discussions, that it can only help men in the realms of thought and of practical duty in so far as it bears strong and consistent witness before the world to the vitality of religion, to the victories of love, and the immortal fellowship of the soul with CHRIST and GOD.

LIFE, RELIGION & AFFAIRS.

AN ITALIAN BOOK OF SHORT STORIES.

THE name of Count Tommaso Gallarati Scotti is unknown to the English public at large, but probably not so to those who may have taken an active interest in the Modernist movement in its earlier stages, in Italy and elsewhere.

Count Scotti was one of the foremost of the noble group of young men who first drew the attention towards spiritual problems of many earnest minds in Italy, where the spiritual needs were beginning at last to realise themselves through the thick mists of materialism and religious indifference, peculiar to Catholic countries. Modernism, not yet baptized as such by the Encyclical Pascendi, was still in its golden age. The whole movement was seething with young life; unexpected vistas opened before many souls, starved by scholastic logic and cold formality, who saw in it a new possibility of belief and hope, and spiritual life. The good tidings were spreading among those who had given up every hope of conciliating intellect and feeling. Milan seemed once more to deserve the name of Pioneer of Italy. Priests of high learning and fervent soul preached the new gospel of life, and men of all conditions and callings crowded those same churches where once barely a few women might be seen. After a Lenten course of sermons by F. Semeria, the number of communicants was beyond any record. People felt as if some dead place in their heart had suddenly leaped into life. It seemed as if a spiritual spring were forcing its joyous way through the long frozen earth.

A group of young apostles of the new ideals gathered then together to found an ethical-religious review, the Rinascimento, and no effort was spared to further their spiritual mission; Count Gallarati Scotti laid at its service his gifted word, giving lectures, some of which are to many, even to this day, a conscience-stirring remembrance. He took an active part with D. Romolo Murri, then still a priest, in trying to give a wider, more intensely religious content to the "Lega Democratica Nazionale." To those young forces many riper intellects joined in the common aim, moved by the common hope of seeing the old church become truly catholic not only in name but in fact. The deceased writer A. Fogazzaro, the spiritual father of Count Gallarati Scotti, had given the profits of his widely diffused "Santo" for a course of lectures to be yearly held in Turin on any subject connected with religious problems. After the condemnation of this plan of his, he wisely devolved that sum to social reform in Calabria, entrusting this work to his young friends, Count Gallarati Scotti and others, who are even now actively carrying out his wishes. But, as is now well known, that happy period to which we sometimes look back with a kind of sorrowful tenderness, as to some vanished dream of our youth, was soon to be followed by bitter disappointment, by heroic self-suppression, and by painful differences dividing friends from friends. Some believed their duty to lie in holding firm to what they deemed to be the only saving plan for modern consciences, resolved to resist even excommunication sooner than yield. Others thought to serve the cause better in bowing, at least apparently, their heads, and accepting any imposition as a means of spiritual discipline. Count Gallarati Scotti was one of these latter, and the book* which we propose briefly to notice reflects some of the inmost and often conflicting elements of this sensitive and deeply mystical mind. The book has probably been already pointed out to the English reader. Many of its stories, particularly those dealing with Biblical and mediæval subjects, show an admirably refined artistic sense and true poetical feeling; the choice of the very words proves how familiar the writer is with Italian Trecentists, and one can perceive many touches direct from nature in the highly picturesque description of Syrian landscape.

But it is to a particular problem, which the author often alludes to, but somewhat shirks from solving or seems inclined to consider from a single point of view, that I should like to attract the notice of those who feel an interest in spiritual questions. The author aims at the same conclusion through his two stories, "Prometheus" and "La leggenda di S. Ruth e il crociato"—we might say three, were we to take into account "La morte di Nausica." But we will keep to the first two as representing more fully the author's postulate: "Even at the cost of fostering prejudice and superstition, the faith of the humble must be respected and preserved." Prometheus is bound upon his rock, his heart bleeding and rent by the eagle; he is cold and proud, listening unmoved to the reproachful moans of the last Oceanide. Only at last, when she accuses him of having torn from men their faith in the Gods, their happy and dearest delusion, does he cry aloud in his hopeless repentance, and feels himself slowly sinking in the misty darkness where the myths have vanished. Evidently the author looks upon the mythical hero more in the light of a Lucifer whose ruthless pride is conquered at last by the desolation he has spread among men, than as the martyr of Truth, sublimely symbolical of the eternal doom awaiting all light-bearers in this life. And it is also to be remarked that both Prometheus and the Oceanide weep over the destruction of men's hopes, well knowing that they were nothing but dreams.

The second one, "La leggenda di S. Ruth e il crociato," tells of an old Crusader who has consciously helped his emperor, Frederic II., in a sacrilegious scheme.

Wishing to conquer the favour of a city, Frederic sends to its bishop a golden chest, containing, according to his message the body of S. Ruth the Moabitess, reverently brought over by his warriors from Palestine. The whole city joyfully accepts the sacred gift, which contains nothing but the remains of a beautiful slave, the dead mistress of the same warrior who had been charged to bring it as a precious relic to the pious Calabrian town. Many years have elapsed, and the people still devoutly pray to St. Ruth to protect their harvest and preserve their flocks from danger. At last, in his old age, Ugo d' Acerra's conscience awakes to the enormity of his sin, and he resolves to take secretly down from its altar the golden sarcophagus and hide it somewhere in the woods far from the town. He tells some friars of a revelation he has had, commanding him to conceal the holy body, to save it from a coming persecution. On their way to the woods, they stop to rest awhile in the shade of trees and then he hears in his sleep the soft voice of the woman he had passionately loved, imploring him to let her be, "Not to snatch her from her place in the humble souls who turned to her in their unquestioning faith. It was only too true; she had been but a sinful woman, but the divine flame of their faith had purified her, and made her like what they deemed her to be. What does signify the name these poor bones once bore? What really matters is not a dead body dissolving in dust, but the heavenly flame which it can light in the human heart. Faith is the poetry of the world! Oh, don't destroy the only thing which gives meaning to life; beware of quenching it with your breath while you talk of what might or might not be true." A very fine passage follows, which might suggest to some of us a meaning far from the author's own mind. He seems, reaching thus an extreme pragmatistic position, not to set great weight on the object of devotion in its intrinsic worth as long as it is capable of kindling faith; a faith which acts more as an alleviation of earthly sorrow, as a soothing drug, than as a tonic strengthening man to conquer life's difficulties, and help him on in the narrow way of light and truth. And that is where superstition shows its essential fallacy; it can prove to some souls a kind of homely comfort, but it lacks the moral quality, and we often see its results in the un-Christian actions of so-called pious people.

Of course, there is much in the author's claim that must be taken into account. Every one of us, however free from prejudice, would carefully abstain from depriving simple souls of the often absurd beliefs which very truly may prove a help to them. But we cannot close our eyes to the other side of the problem which is all the while before us; if we allow superstition to crown superstition how is such a disfigured religion to appeal to modern men and women of average brains and culture? Are they to be sacrificed to their smaller brethren? Are their souls of lesser value in the sight of God? The Catholic Church, which has often seemed lately to think in this way, and whose fault it very often is if through her public condemnations, facts and doctrines which would be serenely debated among scholars, and if taught by them would be explained in a religious and reverent spirit, reach down to the ignorant distorted into crude atheism, surely should endeavour (while taking the utmost care not to startle the simpler consciences of her flock) to draw out slowly and patiently, before their very eyes, the golden thread of eternal truth, from under the coarse texture of superstition, gradually laying greater and greater stress on the spiritual as opposed to the materialistic side. But the chief obstacle lies at the root of things. Its removal rests on the assumption of good-will and open intellect among our clergy, and, unfortunately, both are very seldom attainable in the average priest of to-day. The goodwill can only arise from the mind being alive to the necessity of exerting it, and our seminaries and the present bent of Roman authorities leave very little room for any such mental condition.

Another weak point in the author's theory lies in the fact that much which may have been right in the thirteenth century does not necessarily hold good in the twentieth, where one often finds spreading among the lower classes the most sceptical forms of materialistic socialism. It is something very different from ingenuous superstition, quickly laughed away by a comrade, that is needed to hold the men and women of our day firmly to the path of faith.

The two stories whose chief characteristics we have tried to set before the reader show no trace of conflicting tendencies in the writer's mind, were it not perhaps for the passionate eagerness with which the author seems to justify not only to others but to himself the blind loyalty to every tradition. But a clearer glimpse is afforded to us by the short sketch touching one of the meekly bold disciples of St. Francis of Assisi. The humble friar had dared to raise his voice against the sins of Rome, and Pope Boniface had answered his warning cry by throwing him into prison. Fra Jacopone sorely missed his free, wandering life, and the only comfort of his lonely hours was the daily visits of a poor tramp who used to stop at the barred window of his cell. The beggar's talk fell as a strangely soft balm on the bruised soul of the excommunicated man. At last, one day, the prisoner felt that his sufferings would soon be at an end, and Death, waxing near, would set him free. The stranger was standing as usual, close to the little window, but, in the place of the rugged countenance he knew, the heavenly face of Christ himself shone lovingly upon the dying man. The poor friar whom the supreme Head of the Visible Church had condemned had found in his Lord a compassionate friend.

LIBERAL JUDAISM.

IF the movement bearing the above title succeeds in realising its hopes, it will owe its success more to Mr. Claude Montefiore than to any other man. He has been the untiring advocate of its cause, the patient exponent of its principles, and, on its behalf, he has borne a considerable amount of disapproval in Jewish circles. His task is no easy one, if it depends on sympathetic acceptance of his views. For, in the nature of things, his appeal is not to Christians; and, while the whole number of Jews in the world is but a small fraction of the total population, a large proportion of Jews are, by temperament and mental training, likely to be hardened against such arguments as his case requires. The thorough-going Talmud Jew will see no reason why there should be any attempt to liberalise his Judaism, and many why there should not. The criticism of the Pentateuch has not as yet invaded his sanctuary; and he keeps his ancestral faith in the Torah, written and unwritten, and his ancient reproach of "Epicuros!" for anyone who should tamper with it. The Zionist looks forward in a direction which is by no means that of Liberal Judaism; and, by the very nature of his aim—a territorial, possibly a political, expression of Jewish nationality—virtually condemns Liberal Judaism. And those Jews whose idea of liberalising Judaism consists mainly in getting rid of whatever is inconvenient in it, will not be attracted to a lofty spiritual Theism nor ready to meet the demands it would make upon them. Liberal Judaism is as yet the ideal of a few, and perhaps will never, or not for a long time, be anything more. But it is a noble ideal, and the contribution it makes to contemporary religious thought could ill be spared. Even if it should not win to its allegiance the majority of Jews, it shows, in a way which those who are not Jews can understand and will do well to ponder, that the life of the spirit still stirs in the Judaism which is supposed to have died long ago, the ancient stock can still bud and blossom as in the days of the prophets.

Liberal Judaism has obvious affinities with Liberal Christianity, and especially with that type of Liberal Christianity to which the name of Unitarianism is commonly given. For each of these is essentially a spiritual Theism, in which the Unity of God is not complicated by metaphysical distinctions. In the one case the form of expression is given by the antecedents of Jewish history, and in the other by those of Christian history; and any fusion of the two into one is not to be expected, perhaps not even to be desired. But the contents of belief, so far as regards the relation of the soul to God, are very much the same for both; and it is at least possible for each to wish God-speed to the other with the sympathy of friendship which can dispense with identity of name. Just as Liberal Christianity seeks to recover and set forth the essential truths of the Christian religion, in harmony with the admitted results of scientific criticism of the Bible and of progressive thought generally, so Liberal Judaism, accepting those same results, seeks to recover and set forth the essential truths of the Jewish religion, and more particularly to re-interpret the special function of Israel as an instrument of the Divine purpose towards mankind.

In doing this, Liberal Judaism is only taking up again the message of the prophets, especially of him, or them, whose words are found in the later chapters of the book of Isaiah. The Judaism which produced the Talmud did not disown that message, but certainly did not make the fulfilment of the function therein implied its chief purpose. And Liberal Judaism declares that the time has now come to pass out from the limitations self-imposed upon Rabbinism, though these were good and necessary in their time, and to take up the task for which, through those limitations, Israel has been kept from dispersion and conscious of its high calling.

In an extremely interesting little book, characteristic of its author on every page, Mr. Montefiore gives what he calls "Outlines of Liberal Judaism" (London: Macmillan & Co.; 2s. 6d. net). It is intended to meet a particular want, namely, to help those who being themselves in sympathy with Liberal Judaism, wish to bring up their children on its principles. The author's first intention was to write a book that might be read by children themselves; but he soon gave up that intention and wrote for parents and teachers. Judging from the earlier chapters, the change was a wise one, for they are no easy reading even for adults, and I doubt whether children could profit by them at all. Mr. Montefiore is perhaps too insistent upon his own want of qualification for his task; after all, he has the one essential qualification, a deep conviction of the truth of what he says and of the necessity of saying it. And a book written by a profound philosopher and expert scholar might well have less power of direct appeal to human nature on its religious and moral side, than is possessed by this modest volume written by Mr. Montefiore, being what he says he is. Although it is not intended for Christians, there is much in it which Christians, at all events Liberal Christians, can read with interest and benefit. For they, too, have to face the task of training up their children so that they may have a religion of their own, a trust in God and an ideal of his service which shall rest not merely upon tradition imparted to them, but upon convictions of their own, justified to their own reason and conscience. Christians have not indeed to settle their account with such difficulties as those arising out of the dietary laws and other distinctive features of traditional Judaism. But Liberal Christians have had to deal with the question of the supreme authority of the Bible, as being literally the word of God; and they, equally with Jews, have to take thought for the development on right lines of their children's thoughts about God and their relation to Him. Mr. Montefiore sets forth in this book his ideas of how these questions should be dealt with by Jewish parents and teachers; and part of the value of what he says consists in the fact that he has consulted several friends (candid friends, too), as he has proceeded, and that he very honestly reproduces their criticisms. The book is full of suggestion, and consequently of interest; and if Christians can be found who have time or inclination to take notice of what Jews are doing and thinking, they should by all means read it. How far Mr. Montefiore will be able to inspire his co-religionists with his own fervent belief in the ideals of Liberal Judaism remains to be seen; but even if he continues to be as "one crying in the wilderness," he will be doing what many a true prophet has done before him; and, like them, he too has the word of the Lord, and proclaims it faithfully. May he, in the years to come, see "the travail of his soul and be satisfied."

THE SMALL BOY.

I HAVE been making a tour of factories lately with a view to discovering the small boy's position industrially. But I cannot find the small boy, let alone his position. Where is he? What becomes of him after he leaves school? I see him in the street, certainly, but apparently there he is entirely the master of his own fate, and his industrial position concerns him not at all. He loiters in gangs round the large railway stations; I see him singly or with a special crony gazing in shop windows; surveying life from street corners; occasionally, very, very occasionally, I see him peeping in at the entrance to some works, when I imagine some faint notion that he ought to hold an industrial position is assailing him. A certain number of his kind do street trading (of which more later), each one of him carefully badged and labelled, but he does not do much of this kind of labour. In some towns he appears scarcely to exist as a street trader. In London alone does he adopt it largely. But it is not the London boy of fourteen I am seeking; it is the boy of large Midland industrial centres. I go into a motor and bicycle chain factory, and think here I shall find him. Bicycles and motors seem to fascinate all boys, but I seek him in vain in annealing room, at punching, drilling machines, at lathes, at sorting. Small girls everywhere and big girls, too, for the matter of that; but the small boy—no. "Had they no small boys just left school?" I asked at last. "Yes, they had one!" I thought the foreman seemed proud to be able to tell me they had one. He took me to a small workshop, and there was a small boy. He stood with an aloof air putting lengths of steel into a machine which turned them into something else in its inside, so that they came out quite different at the other end. It was extraordinarily wonderful, but the small boy seemed impressed neither with the machine nor his industrial position. He was no ordinary boy, I am convinced; in fact, I am not sure he was a boy at all. If he had been I am quite certain he would have had that machine in pieces to find out what went on inside it. And here a thought struck me: Is this one reason why the small boy is not employed in factories? Is his insatiable desire to see the "wheels go round" so ingrained in him that it is not safe to leave him with any mysterious pieces of mechanism? Have manufacturers tried him and been obliged to discard him for this habit? Surely here is a subject for research.

I passed on to another factory—studs and buttons. Girls, girls, girls; no boys, not even the make-believe of one. Next an artificial jewellery maker's. Girls again, heaps of them fresh from school; but here again I only found one small boy. He was very small, and he held a tool against a grindstone and ground it. He looked at me with an ashamed eye. Mentally he said, "I am here on compulsion; this is no place for a man like me among these girls. I'd go this minute, only circumstances are against me." I tried to win him to conversation, but in vain. He maintained an abashed silence.

Up and down town I went into factories everywhere to find the small boy, and found him not, or only in ones or twos against dozens of the opposite sex. I heard of one factory only that employed boy labour in any great number, and that belonged to a manufacturer who made lenses for telescopes, opera glasses, microscopes, &c. He preferred boys to girls; I begin to think he is unique.

Finally, I sought the Labour Exchange in a large manufacturing city in the Midlands. "What about the small boys who come here seeking work?" I asked the head of the Exchange. "Well," he said, "they come, but we have great difficulty in finding places for them; it is easy enough to place girls fresh from school, but not boys. There are plenty of vacancies for them, but there are either not enough suitable boys or the boys do not care to take the situation. There is very much more unemployment among boys than among girls.

"Here are some figures taken at random from the Board of Trade Labour Gazette from June to November for a large Midland manufacturing town. There were 458 vacancies for boys notified during that period and 154 for girls; 326 of the boys' situations were filled, leaving 132 vacancies unfilled, but of the 154 girls' vacancies, 129 were filled, leaving only 25 vacant. During this period 834 boys applied for work and 586 girls, so that if you compare the number of vacancies that are filled by the number of boys and girls you will see that there is, as I said, very much more unemployment among the former than among the latter. The ranks of the hooligan and the unemployable are constantly recruited from this army of boys who cannot get places, or who do not choose to take what is offered, or if they do take it do not trouble to keep it.

"You can get figures like these from numbers of other towns. Now here are some more figures relating to the employment of boys for the whole of the country. During the six months from June to November, 50,618 vacancies were notified; 42,981 were filled. 94,727 boys applied for work during this time; so these figures mean that in December there was an army consisting of 51,746 boys unemployed in the United Kingdom."

"The hooligans cannot get them all," I said. "What really does become of them?"

"Ah! that's a problem," said the Labour Exchange man. "We should solve a good deal if we could solve that. The human boy, as all wise people know, is a wild animal, and if anyone could invent a taming patent we should be able perhaps to do something. The Scout movement is doing excellent work and will do still more, and it does so because it uses the wild animal instinct and energy in a right way. Make a boy a Scout and you are on the way to tame him, without blunting or damaging any of those instincts which are the divine right of boys. It is pent-up energy that makes a boy a criminal nine cases out of ten."

"You are absolutely right," I said, "but in the meantime where is my small boy?"

So I said farewell to the Labour Exchange and hied me on my quest. Street union clubs I sought next. The small boy was here certainly, ready for play at all events. 900 junior boys—that is under fourteen—and 300 senior boys, many of these last just left or leaving school. I questioned and questioned as to work. "Nuthin' much," seemed the general answer in the different clubs I went to. Only 300 after all of the sort I wanted. Street trading flashed into my mind; this must take them, but it did not in this particular town, though there were actually more boys on the register—1,276—than applied for work in six months at the Labour Exchange. But then many, indeed the majority, were of school age.

So I went home with the problem unsolved as to what becomes of the boy when he leaves school. Can anyone help me to solve it? Is not the fact that this question of the boy is unanswered the reason for the unemployment in the country continuing to be so pressing an evil; for, though I have spoken of one town only, the same facts could be brought forward about all the big manufacturing towns in a greater or less degree. Is it not time a Royal Commission "sat" on the small boy and tried to find out what does become of him?

THE ART OF LISTENING.

HAVE you ever found yourself at workshop-hour in a Friends' meeting-house? A few unostentatious folk sitting quite still, lost in thought and prayer. The opposite to all that is social, say some. The antithesis to fellowship. Icicles. Each lost in the contemplation of his own soul. Selfishness spiritualised. Individualism idealised. "Each for himself and the devil take the hindmost," with a halo of holiness to sanction its transfer from the secular to the sacred. Such is the very natural outcome of a hurried and superficial glance. But pause. Cannot a oneness and a coming together be detected in the subtle, silent atmosphere? If we sit still, expectant, and listen, the result will be an effect upon the mind deeper, stronger, and more lasting than that produced by the most gifted orator or the most talented musician.

Whenever I think of the secret of the listening ear, I am reminded of a phrase that fell from the lips of a preacher as I sat once in a tiny Unitarian chapel at a South Coast seaside resort. Prayer, said he, is not so much talking to God, as listening to His voice in the deeper recesses of one's own nature. One had not then escaped from the evangelical teaching of the older school. There was still lurking in the background of my thought a God whom Henry Drummond once described as little bigger than the president of a religious denomination. The idea of immanence, of an all-pervading spirit, with whom it was possible for all human souls to enjoy converse, had not reached me. The anthropomorphic conception had to be uprooted. "God in the depths of each soul" was a mere phrase, not a living experience. God as a mighty external monarch, with the heart at times of a Christ, delegating His converse with men to chosen messengers, was the highest view I had experienced, and I should have hailed it with delight, had I then heard the Hebrew proverb which tells us, "God could not be everywhere, so he sent mothers."

A high tribute to motherhood, indeed, but a mean conception of the Eternal. I have since learnt that God is everywhere and in all things, and that His presence may be known and felt to the sensitive mind and the obedient heart. I have discovered Him, not only in motherhood, but in fatherhood, and fraternity; not only in the house of prayer and the place set apart for His glory, but in nooks and corners and out-of-the-way spots, which, if He could not be everywhere, He might have overlooked. I once asked myself where divinity began and humanity left off. It was a hot day in a dusty Shoreditch street. I had just been into a news-agent's shop to get a copy of Brotherhood. I remember that well. Its title asked me awkward questions. There was a crowd around a doorstep, a poor, dusty, tired crowd. I pushed through to see what the folk were looking at. It was a sleeping child. There is nothing so beautiful as a child asleep. That beauty was not absent, even here. But it was a child covered with filthy rags, his head smothered in vermin, blood running from a wound on his forehead, the victim perhaps of a drunken parent, unconscious of his miseries in the kind forgetfulness of sleep. But what struck me as being so beautiful was the attitude of that crowd. One woman, regardless of the filth, was smoothing back the tangled locks and showing to another the scars, with words of burning indignation and loving anger. There was given to every person in that crowd something which for the moment was a divine revelation, binding all together as one being, and lifting each away from his customary limitations. God was there. He is in the deeper recesses of our human nature. That preacher, when he spoke of prayer to his little congregation, was right.

Prayer is not so much talking as listening.

We speak sometimes of "the lost art of conversation," and "the decay of oratory." We say our pulpits are no longer filled by preachers. But is not intelligent listening as necessary to good conversation as intelligent talking? Orators not only move audiences, but are affected by their audiences. It is impossible to preach with power to an impassive and indifferent assembly. There were places where Jesus could do no mighty work. He was too sensitive to the atmosphere.

This question of speaking and listening is a vital one to the liberal religious movement. Summer-schools, open conferences, and Adult Schools have been described as places where people go to argue. If that be a true definition, the sooner such gatherings make way for something more useful, the better. There is a danger of such assemblies becoming mere centres of controversy and homes of debate. In acknowledging this, we must not in the least undervalue the effect of public controversy and freedom of speech. The grappling of truth and falsehood in the open does not mean victory for the latter. Our right to speak as our consciences dictate has been dearly won, and is often regarded with base ingratitude and an indifference akin to treachery. But a man who is slow to speak is seldom profligate in his utterance. The value of words, like many other things, is not estimated in quantity, but in quality.

The person who is eternally talking has neither time nor inclination to listen. They tell us that a blind man, or a man deficient in one sense, is compensated by the possession of another sense in abnormal measure. One thinks of that when confronted by the chatter-box, the tale-bearer, the eaves-dropper, the mortal who is ever publicly airing his opinions and contradicting the opinions of his neighbours. They all lack that quality of spirit and charm of personality, that indescribable influence over their fellows that one always associates with the person who thinks, meditates, and prays, and finds peace and health in listening to those voices for which mediocrity has no ear.

Can we hope that in the near future every religious body may become a centre of men and women sensitive to the spiritual instincts and illimitable possibilities concealed in their own natures? They will learn the art of listening—the secret of silence. It is a secret rather than an art. It cannot be purchased in a series of lessons. It cannot be learnt by rote, or ladled out in so many lectures, at so much a course. It is the fruit of intuition, the harvest of experience, rather than something borrowed or bought. It has often been told that two eminent thinkers spent an evening in one another's company without uttering a syllable, except to express at parting their appreciation of such enjoyable intercourse.

Such an experience is not confined to these two men. The accumulated testimony of Quakerism, for example, is a factor which cannot be hastily dismissed by modern students of religious psychology.

A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

SIR,—At the dawn of the nineteenth century the industrial consciousness of our nation, working out its life in stupendous strife, was not dissimilar from what it is in the present day. The recent situation makes strenuous moral and religious demands upon the individual hearts of men and the general life of the community. These demands seem imperfectly realised. Nearly a hundred years ago, a leading article appeared in the Times to the following effect:—"We do affirm that the actions of this pitiable class of men (the labourers) as a commentary on the treatment experienced by them at the hands of the upper and middling classes; the gentlemen clergy (who ought to teach and instruct them) and the farmers who ought to pay and feed them, are disgraceful to the British name. The present population must be provided for in body and in spirit on more liberal and christian principles."

If the present editor of the Times followed the habit of some preachers, and used his sermons more than once, then this article might have appeared again, in these latter days with considerable justification.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

"AMONG FRIENDS."

"Among Friends." By Samuel McChord Crothers. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25.

THE welcome prospect of another visit from Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass., reminds us of his last volume of essays, with its title of good omen, an admirable fourth to add to the earlier volumes, "The Gentle Reader," "The Pardoner's Wallet," and "By the Christmas Fire." This latest volume contains one essay, which will recall to many of our readers the last occasion when Dr. Crothers was in this country, in 1906, when he gave the Essex Hall Lecture, and preached for some weeks both in Birmingham and at Essex Church. The address which he gave at the ministers' meeting that year in Whit-week we find here in the essay, "The Colonel in the Theological Seminary." Nine essays in all there are, and not one of them without touches of that quaint humour which blends so happily with the strong common-sense and the ethical passion of the social reformer and the fine insight of the man of letters, and makes of our essayist so delightful a companion. The titles themselves challenge attention and waken a pleasant anticipation, which is by no means disappointed. This is notably the case with the "Colonel" essay, and those on "The Merry Devil of Education," "The Hundred Worst Books," and "The Anglo-American School of Polite Unlearning." This last tells of a school established in London for the benefit of prospective visitors to America and of Americans who come to this country, to secure by plain instruction and the imparting of elementary facts the breaking down of prejudice and the absurd misconceptions which so often stand in the way of mutual appreciation, and the pleasure and profit of visits interchanged by the people of the two countries. Amusing instances of such misconceptions on both sides, as to character and as to geography, are cited with great good-humour, and the effective method employed to break down prejudice. One suggestion, to help the British understanding of America, is made in reply to the complaint, "You can't pin these fellows down to hard facts." "That's just it," is the reply, "the facts these people are dealing with are not hard, they are fluid. . . The American is not a worshipper of things as they are, his curiosity is aroused by the things that are going to be."

The amusing conceit of "The Colonel in the Theological Seminary," appointed there through a special benefaction to a chair of military science, affords an opportunity for a good deal of friendly irony in salutary criticism and sound advice on the subject of the training of ministers. The Colonel has adopted peace principles, but still delights in the soldierly virtues of courage, loyalty, patience, and obedience to rightful authority, and finds a new field for their exercise in the spiritual conflict the Church Militant is called to wage in the world. "He saw at once the irrepressible conflict between those who were banded together on behalf of a spiritual ideal, and the forces of sensuality and selfishness. 'Here is something,' he said, 'that can't be arbitrated. It must be fought out. The Church Militant has, I believe, the right of it, but the question is, is it strong enough to win out? Has it mobilised all its forces, and is it prepared to assume the strategical offensive?'" His lectures, therefore, in the Theological Seminary were directed to make clear to the young men the active nature of their calling. It must not be regarded simply as a matter of husbandry and the care of flocks. The enemy is in the field and must be attacked. To illustrate his point he tells of a minister's meeting he attended, the temper of which roused him to make the following protest: "Gentlemen, I understood that this was to be a council of war. Instead of a plan of campaign, you seem to have brought out a clinical thermometer in order to take each other's temperature. On the eve of any engagement the question is not how you feel, but what you intend to do. Nobody is interested in your symptoms. The only temper which befits men who are called to leadership is that which Wordsworth describes in his character of the Happy Warrior."

How far many ministers have forgotten the ideal of their service expressed in the line, "Like a mighty army moves the Church of God," is suggested in the complaint: "All their arrangements are made on the assumption that the Church is meant to be stationary, and that its officers should lead a sedentary life. Their chief concern is in the construction of permanent barracks."

The Colonel sometimes trespassed, quite innocently, on the fields of his colleagues. We commend especially to the attention of ministers the account of his excursion into the field of homiletics, and his advice as to the use of a text as "a base of operations." There is a most amusing account of a sermon, illustrating a weakness which the Colonel deplored. The preacher had taken a text, and, as he went through various astonishing evolutions, the Colonel watched intently for his plan. "At first I attributed to him a masterly strategy in so long concealing his true objective. He was, I thought, only reconnoitring in force, before calling up his reserves and delivering a decisive blow at an unexpected point. At last the suspicion came that he had no objective, and that he didn't even know that he should have one. He had never pondered the text about the futility of fighting as 'one that beateth the air.'"

Just before Christmas last year Dr. Crothers presided in Boston over an inaugural meeting of the new "Progressive Republican" party of Massachusetts, and there are in this volume two essays which will be read with special interest in the light of the stand he then took—the one "In praise of Politicians," the other on "The Romance of Ethics." Both alike appeal to the highest motives and demand readiness for fearless sacrifice. "The politician aims at success," he says, "but it is not necessary that the success should be personal. It is the final issue of the struggle which must be kept in mind. The politician is quick to seize an opportunity, but it may be only the opportunity to make a beginning in a work so vast that it cannot be completed in his own lifetime." In the charm of Spenser's "Faerie Queene," Dr. Crothers finds ample illustration for his essay on "The Romance of Ethics," which is as living a reality in the present as in the great days of Elizabeth. "Each age flings its challenge at the feet of its valiant youth. And in each generation valiant youth takes up the challenge, and the moral life of the world is renewed." The voice that speaks in these essays has the authentic note, and it is good that in these coming weeks English people are to have opportunities of hearing its living tones again.

THE JESUITS IN KOLOZSVÁR IN THE TIME OF FRANCIS DÁVID.

Epistolae et Acta Jesuitarum Transylvaniae Temporibus Principum Báthory, 1571-1613. Edidit Dr. Andreas Veress. Pp. i-xv, 1-325. Price 10 crowns (8s. 4d.).

THE fame of the little principality called Transylvania was established in the middle part of the sixteenth century. The laws of this country affirm religious liberty and toleration over and over again. The Protestant Reformation took a firm hold among the mountains of gold and forestry. The Roman Catholic bishop had to retire because he lost his flock, and yet the Diet of Transylvania gave freedom to all those who preferred to attach themselves to the Roman Catholic religion. When Luther's followers, and afterwards the Calvinists, applied for admittance, they got it, and in 1568, and again in 1571, Unitarian belief was accepted and confirmed as a state-religion with equal rights with the other three. It was declared over and over again in legal enactments that nobody should be disturbed in exercising and following that religion which pleases him best. Nobody was allowed to punish any man on account of his religion. Freedom was given to every one to preach and print those religious ideas which he found in harmony with his own conviction.

This result was the glory of King John Sigismund and his Court chaplain, the Bishop of Transylvania, Francis Dávid. It took them about fifteen years' hard work to bring it about. John Sigismund died on March 14, 1571, and, after a very sharp fight, the crown fell to the Roman Catholic family of the Báthorys as against the Unitarian Békésy, who was strongly supported by the Unitarians and partly by the Poles. Although he took an oath to give due respect to all the rights already obtained by the different religions, the Prince began, in the very first year of his reign, to show his animosity against the Unitarians and his great favour towards the Roman Catholics. First he dismissed Francis Dávid from the Court, and suspended the right of printing. The last book of Francis Dávid appeared in 1571, because he was not permitted to print any more; not even his defence in the question of paedobaptism and prayer to Christ, which appeared only after his death in 1587. Then he began a secret correspondence with the Jesuits and intended to bring them to Kolozsvár and build a college for them, but the Unitarians were so powerful that this plan did not succeed, at least in Francis Dávid's time.

A most interesting and useful volume has just appeared containing the correspondence of Stephen Báthory, Prince of Transylvania, and the Jesuit Fathers. As many as 100 letters are contained in the book. The greater part is in Latin, some Italian. The editor, Professor Dr. Endre Veress, is probably not a Protestant, for, in the preface, he seems to favour the intentions of the Prince and his co-workers, the Jesuits; but this does not diminish the historical value of the documents which he has published. Hungarian Unitarians do not possess any account of Francis Dávid, from a contemporary source, which does more justice to his greatness in every respect. The book contains 10 letters from a Jesuit named Seleszi. He was present in the Diet at which Francis Dávid was condemned. Unfortunately his account of the scene has been lost.

We learn, however, from a letter by the same writer, what a fiery conflict there must have been between Francis Dávid and Blandrata on the subject of the adoration of Christ. Elsewhere he pays a high tribute to the genius of Francis Dávid in the following words:—"Erat hic vir provectae aetatis (in 1579) acerrimi ingenii, tenacis memoriae; in sacris litteris versatissimus, ita ut videretur vetus et novum testamentum ad unguem tenere. Disputavit, antequam nos intraremus, coram regni proceribus cum Calvinistis et Lutheranis, sed omnes facile superavit. Mos eius erat scripturas per scripturas explicare." This description runs on for more than one and a half pages.

Among the numerous references to Kolozsvár, Transylvania, and the Unitarians whom he calls Arians, there are certainly a great many which will be very welcome to the historian. They must, of course, be accepted cum grano salis, because the letter-writer speaks very often from hearsay, and always from his own point of view.

I am sure there will be many readers of THE INQUIRER who will be glad to hear of the publication of this very interesting book.

THE BEGINNINGS OF THE CHRISTIAN EMPIRE.

The Cambridge Medieval History. Vol. I. Cambridge: At the University Press. 20s. net.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY is doing a great deal to promote the scientific study of history. In the hands of its scholars it has become a matter of minute sub-division of labour, and the literary art which makes the past live in the present is sacrificed to the analysis of documents and the classification of facts. It has struck a death-blow to the mere cultivation of the picturesque and driven the party pamphleteer from the ranks of literature into those of journalism. Everywhere, except in Ireland where this detached and unimpassioned study of history hardly exists, men are ceasing to appeal to the loyalties or hatreds of the present moment as a guarantee of past events. The gradual saturation of society with this temper will probably introduce profound psychological changes into our conflicts of opinion, the full effect of which it is impossible to foresee. But meanwhile there is some loss for the man of ordinary education in the change from the work of art to the scientific encyclopædia, in which it is very hard, except for a few highly trained minds, to see the true correlation of the bewildering mass of facts.

It is as an encyclopædia, the product of the finest English and foreign scholarship, that we may best recommend this great enterprise in medieval history. The scheme, which has been designed by Professor Bury, will be completed in eight volumes under the editorship of Professor Gwatkin and Professor Whitney. Few people are likely to read the present volume right through, but many of the twenty-one chapters in which the various aspects of the first 200 years of the Christian Empire are analysed and described can be detached for separate study. They are particularly rich in material for the history of the Church and the conflict and accommodation between the ideals of Christianity and the forces of Paganism. In this connection we may mention specially the chapters on "The Triumph of Christianity" by Principal Lindsay, "Arianism" by Professor Gwatkin, "The Organisation of the Church" by the Rev. C. H. Turner, "Religious Disunion in the Fifth Century" by Miss Alice Gardner, and "Monasticism" by Abbot Butler. One of the most original and suggestive chapters in the volume is "The Asiatic Background" by Dr. Peisker, of Graz. It opens up unfamiliar vistas both in history and ethnology of extraordinary interest. As in the case of the Cambridge Modern History the place to be assigned to literature and art has clearly been a matter of difficulty to the editors. The two concluding chapters on "Thoughts and Ideas of the Period" and "Early Christian Art" have not been planned on an adequate scale. The latter is by Professor Lethaby, and like everything he writes, it is excellent within the narrow limits assigned to him; but it is little more than a first sketch and is hardly likely to be consulted for purposes of scholarship. His bibliography has also been severely curtailed, and the statement that a complete list of books will be found in Leclercq "Manuel d'Archéologie Chrétienne" will not be of much use unless Leclercq happens to be handy. The other bibliographies are much more exhaustive, and occupy about eighty pages.

THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING. From the Spoken and Written Words of Robert Collyer. Selected and arranged by Imogen Clark. London: The Lindsey Press. 2s. 6d. net.

THIS book will be welcomed by busy people who have few opportunities for quiet reading. The title explains its purpose, to provide spiritual strength for the day's need; and here are garnered some of the ripe fruits of a long life rich in experience. Sublime faith and clear convictions concerning the deep realities of life are expressed in simple language. "We are all within the circle of a great order," says Dr. Collyer, "in which before God a thousand years is as one day." He goes straight to the point, quietly brushing aside cobweb sophistries. "We are not things, but men who can say I will and I will not. We hold the winnings of the million years in heart and brain, in hand and foot, and can waste the treasure or win more as we take heed to our ways, or are heedless and so fall back towards the rude and base beginnings."

He has plain words on practical matters. "Money to a man is like water to a plant, only useful as long as it promotes growth. Like water in fountain or tank, keep it flowing and it blesses, keep it stagnant and it kills." On the subject of Sunday observance he says:—"It will come to pass, that while the man who neglects to take a seventh day, at least, for rest, may be borne along by the vigour of his mind to continual exertion, yet in the long run he will break down sooner and more suddenly than the man who is determined to put aside at least one-seventh of his working life for rest and recreation. But not for this alone will the Christian minister stand by the Sabbath, but because he knows that the needs of the soul are as imperative as those of the body, the hunger of the inner life as sore as that of the outer, and that no man can live by bread alone."

And for lonely hearts there are tender touches which help and heal:—"It is always the old history over again we have to realise, before we can be entirely at rest. The cup is held to our lips, and we shrink back and cry, 'Let this pass from me.' But then the soul says, 'The cup that my Father has given me, shall I not drink it?' and we say, 'Thy will be done,' and then there is quiet."

The extracts are well chosen and well arranged; they are printed in clear type, on good paper. As a frontispiece there is the same beautiful photograph of Dr. Collyer which appears in "Where the Light Dwelleth."

AMONG recent reprints few are more welcome than the late Sir Walter Besant's volumes on London and Westminster (London: Chatto & Windus; each 5s. net). In form they are little inferior to the original editions, and they contain the same wealth of illustrations. Some of the drawings are of places that have already disappeared in the rapid transformation of London in recent years. The view of Crosby Hall, for instance, is of special interest in view of its demolition and re-erection in Chelsea. Others, like the pictures of Cheapside and Fleet-street, are reproduced from old prints, which the wanderer in London who wants to visualise for himself the town of Shakespeare or of Dr. Johnson will find very attractive. Messrs. Chatto & Windus have also added Records of a Family of Engineers to their blue buckram edition of Stevenson. We are not blind to the sumptuous charms of the Edinburgh or the Pentland editions, but for comfortable fireside reading or the holiday portmanteau this surely deserves to be the favourite, and the recent addition of this volume and the Lay Morals makes it complete enough for all except the most luxurious of bibliophiles.

THE editors of the Cambridge Modern History promised their readers two additional volumes, one an index volume and the other a volume of maps. The former has been issued, and represents an immense expenditure of minute labour which will render the twelve volumes of the History far more useful and make its vast storehouse of facts available as a work of reference. In addition to the General Index, there are a series of Genealogical Tables and Lists. The latter contain a great deal of useful information not easily accessible elsewhere; e.g., the names and dates of the Electors of Cologne from 1463, the Electors of Mainz from 1434, and the Electors of Trier from 1439, the Bishops and Archbishops of Paris from 1473, the Generals of the Order of Jesus, the Doges of Venice from 1414, the Governors of the North American Colonies before 1776, the Viceroy of Naples and Sicily 1504-1734, a list of Secularised Bishoprics, &c., to name at random only a few of the subjects upon which carefully tabulated information is supplied. The volume is one which serious students of history will value very highly.

MODERN Greek is perhaps growing in popularity as a subject of study, but the aids for the English student are still comparatively few. There is accordingly room for Professor Albert Thumb's Handbook of the Modern Greek Vernacular, which has just been translated by Dr. S. Angus (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark; 12s. net). The translator explains that the object is to provide the needful helps for the study of the modern vernacular as distinguished from the literary language, which was created as a learned "Atticizing" reaction from the numerous dialects or patois of the common people. The former, it is contended, is the true basis for "the study of a living language with an unbroken history of three thousand years." The literary language, though the product of art, has a long history and reaches back beyond Byzantine days, but apparently it has never become supple enough for popular needs, and Professor Thumb informs us that in modern times lyrical and epic poetry belong almost entirely to the vernacular. The volume is provided with a selection of texts, specimens of dialect, and a glossary.

THE April number of the Utopian, edited by the Hon. Rollo Russell (London: A. C. Fifield; 6d. net), contains a long study of Bruno of Nola, "the Awakener," by the editor. In a striking essay published a few years ago, Professor Oliver Elton reminded us that it was only in the nineteenth century that Giordano Bruno "took his commanding place in the perspective of modern thought and his rank among the stars." All who reverence the memory of the martyrs of thought will be glad to read Mr. Russell's fresh tribute to his greatness.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

SIR THOMAS MORE.
1480-1555.

II.

I promised last week to tell you something about Thomas More's family and friends. One of his greatest friends was Erasmus, a very learned and famous man. More had one son and three daughters; the son was quite a dunce, and this must have been a trouble to his father, though he always made the best of it. His daughters had all the wits of the family, they were clever girls, and More taught them many more things than used to be taught at that time, for he never could see why men should keep all the learning to themselves. He taught the girls (their names were Margaret, Bess, and Cicely) how to write and read perfectly; he taught them Latin and much besides, but above all, he taught them how to "be merry and wise," for that was what he held to. He thought you might be as wise as you liked—the wiser the better—but that God would not be any the more pleased with you for going about with a long face which it made other people melancholy to look at. So that there was a great deal of laughing and joking heard in his house, and his daughters must have been very happy. They had a little room for studying in, each with their own desk and the books they liked best, and in the garden he let them keep pets, and often used to take great scholars and statesmen out there to see the girls' rabbit-hutches or to watch their monkey playing about. He wrote to his children once when he was away on business: "I have given you kisses enough, but stripes hardly ever." He taught them music, which he was very fond of, and not only taught his daughters, but his servants too, so that when they had any spare time they could play the organ or amuse themselves with singing.

It is not many great men who have thought of their servants in this way, or would have minded if their lives were dull, but More thought that everybody ought to have some good and pleasure in their lives besides their daily work, and he says a great deal about this in his famous book the "Utopia," which he wrote during his spare time, while he was living in this happy way at home. (But you must remember that all the while he was very busy about the affairs of the country, so that it is wonderful he found time to write this book, which is only one of several that are less known.) "Utopia" means "Nowhere." It is a kind of fairy-tale—an account of an island called Utopia, where people lived better and happier lives than in England. More imagines that he met a sailor who had just got back from the New World, and who sat down with him in his garden and told him all about this wonderful island that he had seen during his voyage home. There everybody had enough to live upon, because no one was selfish or grasped more than he had a right to, and everybody, after their daily work was done, had some joy and gladness in their lives from practising arts and talking with their friends in lovely gardens. Here is a little bit describing the houses:—

"The streets were twenty feet broad; the houses backed by spacious gardens, and curiously builded after a gorgeous and gallant sort, with their stories one after another. The outsides of the walls be made either of hard flint, or of plaster or else of brick; and the inner sides be well strengthened by timber work. The roofs be plain and flat, covered over with plaster, so tempered that no fire can hurt or perish it, and withstanding the violence of the weather better than lead. They keep the wind out of their windows with glass, for it is there much used, and sometimes with fine linen cloth dipped in oil or amber, and that for two commodities, for by this means more light cometh in and the wind is better kept out."

There, people did not hate each other on account of religion, but everyone was left in peace to be of what religion he chose, so long as he was a good man; only now and then everybody met, dressed all in white, in a beautiful great temple where they all joined in singing hymns and saying prayers such as suited them all. Another thing is that in Utopia people did not mourn for the dead, because they believed they had gone to a better life. There is a great deal more in this wonderful book that I cannot tell you of now—ways of making people's lives better and also more comfortable, such as having glass in windows (the poor people had none, and so were often very cold in winter)—and even a plan for hatching chickens by a machine—a plan we have found out now, but which it was very clever of Sir Thomas More to think of so long before the time. The whole book shows how much he thought of the poor, and how he wished that their lives could be improved by wiser laws and by people treating each other more like brothers. Well, this book made him very famous, and as he was so great a man in the country and so happy at home, you might think that he would do all he could to act so that this sort of life should go on and he should "live happily ever after," as the fairy books say. But, to do this, the first thing necessary was not to quarrel with the King, and Sir Thomas More set his conscience before the King. He had already had several smaller quarrels with him when, in 1534, only four years after he became Lord Chancellor, he had a serious one which cost him his life.

King Henry had said that everyone must take an oath swearing to obey him as head of the English Church, instead of the Pope. Now More was a Roman Catholic, as I have told you, and he thought that the Pope ought to be the head of the Church, and besides, that Henry would be much more tyrannical and headstrong than the Pope, if he had it all his own way. So he refused to take this oath, and gave up his post of Lord Chancellor. He was imprisoned in the Tower as a traitor; but instead of feeling himself in disgrace, he said as he stepped into the boat that was to take him there, "I thank the Lord, the day is won." He meant, you see, that he had done what was right, and that was all that mattered. He was kept in prison for a year, as the King still liked him and hoped to make him change his mind, but it was no use. More stuck to what he believed to be right, though it must have been a hard struggle for him when he remembered that by so doing he was giving up his chance of going back to his wife and daughters and living in his beautiful home once more. So in a year's time he was sentenced to be beheaded. At the very last he was just as brave and merry as he had always been. His daughter Margaret rushed through the crowd to say good-bye to him, crying bitterly, but even then he did not break down, but comforted her with wise, kind words, saying she was not to mourn for him, for he was going to a far better place. When he got to the scaffold, he said to the officer standing by, "I pray you see me up; for my coming down I can shift for myself;" and just before the executioner was going to strike he moved his beard away, saying, "Pity that should be cut off, that has never committed treason." It is only a very great and good man who could have such a brave heart as to joke like this at his own death, and from all I have told you, you can believe how good Sir Thomas More was. He knew that though they killed his body, they could not touch his soul, and he knew this through having lived such a good life that the soul was the strongest part of him. Whenever you think of him, remember that great men aren't always grave and serious, but that "the righteous" should also be "merry and joyful."

DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

MEETINGS AND SOCIETIES

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE: Its History and Purpose.

IN view of the Triennial Meetings of the National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations—to give its full official title—to be held in Birmingham, for the second time, next week, a brief statement of its history and objects may be useful.

The Conference has gradually grown into what it is to-day. At a meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1881, a committee was appointed "to make arrangements for a meeting of ministers and laymen for religious fellowship and conference in some district in England." It was agreed that such meeting be held in Liverpool in the following year, and "invitations were first issued to all ministers and congregations in the Unitarian Almanac, and to the leading laymen of the body, with a postscript asking for the names of ministers and others to whom it was thought desirable that circulars should be sent." The widest possible basis was desired. Advertisements offering circulars of invitations were inserted in papers like The Christian World, The Freeman, The Nonconformist, and The Independent. Well-known leaders outside Unitarian circles were asked to take part in the meeting, but the only one to respond to the invitation seems to have been the Rev. Joseph Wood, then Congregationalist minister at Leicester, who has since rendered splendid service to the Conference, notably as its President, 1906-1909.

The remarkable success of the Liverpool meeting, as regards both numbers and enthusiasm, led to similar meetings being held in Birmingham in 1885, and since then they have been held triennially. The meetings have always been open to all comers, but practical considerations of accommodation, combined with a desire to give the Conference a representative character, caused personal invitations to be limited to ministers and definitely appointed delegates from congregations and societies. A further step was taken at a special meeting held in London in 1898, when it was resolved that the Committee of the Conference, having been constituted on a basis to represent the various congregations and associations which compose the Conference, "be instructed to hold regular meetings to consult, and when considered advisable, to take action in matters affecting the well-being and interests of the congregations and societies which form the Conference, as by directing attention, suggesting plans, organising expressions of opinion, raising funds to carry out the foregoing objects; or summoning, if it deem it needful, a special meeting of the Conference." Thus the Conference has gradually become the recognised organ of the Churches which it represents. Without seeking to exercise anything in the way of ecclesiastical authority, it is always striving to draw the Churches more closely to each other in the bonds of fellowship and to make them stronger through and for mutual helpfulness.

What has it actually done in this way? In the first place, its triennial meetings have aroused and strengthened the sense of common aims and needs and duties. They have brought together representatives from every part of the Kingdom—many of them holding the fort in lonely places—to confer on matters of importance, to be quickened by the preacher's or speaker's word, and the collective voice of praise and prayer.

But more than this, the Conference has initiated several important movements and societies. The Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, which now has a capital of over £27,000, and distributes annually £1,400, was founded at the first meeting. This was followed in 1902 by the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, which possesses a capital of £25,340, and enables nearly one-third of our ministers to make some provision for old age and death. It is hoped that the forthcoming meetings will witness a further step in the direction of making more adequate provision for our ministers. The Conference has also been the means of establishing Advisory Committees throughout England and Wales, whose chief object is to inquire into the credentials of men desiring to enter the ministry who have not passed through one of the accredited colleges. There are five such committees, and the importance and delicacy of their duties are indicated by the fact that one of them during the past year has had to deal with no fewer than 17 applications.

Then there is the Ministerial Settlements Board, whose services are at the disposal of any congregation or minister desiring a settlement. The need for this Board is shown by the frequency with which its help is sought. The function of the Committee for the Supply of Ministers is indicated by its title, and none is of greater concern to the welfare of the Churches. The Committee has organised and is working a scheme of study to assist men possessing essential gifts for the ministry, but lacking early training. The Guilds Union, to encourage young people to band themselves together for religious objects and the Social Service Union, to arouse in the Churches a deeper interest in the pressing social problems of the day, further illustrate the wide scope of Conference interest. At the coming meetings, what is known as the Circuit Scheme will be brought forward with the view of strengthening some of the weak places and making more effective use of existing resources.

It will thus be seen that the National Conference has not only an honourable past, but also a future, which entitles it to the loyal support of all who are interested in the Churches of its fellowship.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

PROGRAMME OF THE TRIENNIAL MEETINGS AT BIRMINGHAM, APRIL 16-19, 1912.

NOTE.—All the gatherings will be held in the Town Hall, except where otherwise stated.

C. Ballantyne; (d) "Our Music," by Mr. John Harrison; (e) "The Guild," by Rev. J. J. Wright. 12.30 p.m.—Address (without discussion) by Rev. Dr. S. H. Mellone, on "Prayer."

Mr. Ronald Williams (Director of Labour Exchanges, Liverpool), who, together with Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., will open the discussion on "Unemployment" at the National Conference, is a distinguished expert on the subject, being one of four directors throughout England under Government.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

Good Friday Meeting.

THE annual meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association—the sixty-seventh meeting—was held in Manchester this year. The unsettled and boisterous weather joined with the equally unsettled state of train services to militate against any record numbers, but still there were large attendances at the meetings, and the Association's greatest event of the year was an undoubted success.

The proceedings began with a service in Cross-street Chapel, and the grand old building with its noble traditions commanded even more than ordinary reverence when it was filled with a congregation little short of seven hundred, all holding it in common respect. The preacher was the Rev. Douglas Walmsley, B.A., who took for his text "the Lord's free man" (1 Cor. 7, 22). He quoted a description of ideal manhood—mens sancta in corpore sancto, one might almost say—and proceeded to seek the motive that would bring about this result. To produce a man full of "the best consecrated to the best," to produce that "generous enthusiasm of faith and service, self-forgetting and without reward," there must be thought for the general cause. Salve qui peut meant panic. Some philosophers had found the root of human activity in self-interest; others in benevolence. Yet let them consider the mixed nature of such a body of men as the disciples, and see how nobly they bore themselves for the most part: somehow there must be instilled into men that spirit which made an ordinary kindly act an act of salvation, "that unconscious goodness which is sweetest and saintliest." The need of the day was the character the beatitudes indicate: Christ's free man was our want.

Lunch was provided at the Lower Mosley-street Schools, and the afternoon was spent in different ways to suit varying inclinations. The Home Missionary College and the Art Gallery attracted some; others were shown over the School of Technology by Mr. J. H. Reynolds, M.Sc., the late Principal. The staid remainder attended the business meeting in the Memorial Hall. The President (the Rev. C. Peach), in moving the adoption of the Report, spoke hopefully of the spirit of restraint displayed in the present industrial contest, and after extending a cordial welcome to delegates from kindred associations, proceeded to consider more in detail some aspects of the work dealt with in the Report. We cannot but regret, he said, the frequent occurrence of the word "regret" in our reports, and the failure of schools to avail themselves of facilities offered by the Association. The Holiday Homes (a movement in which the Manchester Association did pioneer work) had enjoyed a continuance of their success, though their usefulness might be yet further extended. Finally, he expressed distrust of new methods of school management which did little more than re-christen the non-essential. The spirit of the work mattered more than the method.

Mr. H. J. Broadbent, President-elect, seconded the adoption of the Report, and called attention to the excellence of the Notes for Teachers recently published, and of much work brought to notice by the Visiting Committee—itsself a most useful branch of the Association's activity. He specially commended the work of Primary Departments managed on the Archibald System.

As President of the Sunday School Association the Rev. J. J. Wright insisted on the most cordial relations between that body and the Manchester organisation, and, disclaiming all rivalry said that the volumes of stories for the use of teachers which the Association was bringing out would work in admirably with the Notes published in Manchester. He spoke of the Summer Schools held at Oxford and expressed the willingness of the Sunday School Association to assist in the working of an additional school in the North if a demand should be forthcoming. Mr. W. R. Marshall, the Rev. H. R. Tavener, and Mr. D. Lee also spoke, representing the London, Yorkshire and Midlands Associations respectively. After a very cordial invitation for next year from the Mosley School the meeting came to an end.

The evening meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, the chair being occupied by Mr. J. H. Reynolds. The best thanks of the Association were accorded for the excellent entertainment they had found at Lower Mosley-street, and then the chairman called upon the Rev. H. E. Perry to read his paper on "Co-operation in Sunday School Work," after himself giving a short address in which he paid a tribute to the good work already accomplished and characteristically demanded that Sunday schools should work for a civic ideal. Mr. Perry said that the principles he was advocating were generally acknowledged: he conceived his task rather to be the indication of specific cases in which co-operation might help to bring about better results and increased efficiency. Liberty must be preserved intact, but it was no restriction of liberty to keep step in the army of progress. The teacher's ambition must not be selfish: individualism must not imply that waste which naturally ensued when one man's work did not fit in with his fellow's. Similarly schools must be loyal to the Association, and by making more use of it they would strengthen its hands. The lectures and holiday homes instituted by the Association were not so extensively utilised as they might be. Then there must be co-operation of school and parent, of school and church. An animated discussion followed, which was opened by the Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A.; it was continued by the Revs. Morley Mills (who suggested interchange of teachers), E. H. Pickering and others. The Rev. H. E. Dowson brought back the debate to its starting point by a plea for co-operation between young and old to secure the ideal unity of church and school.

We regret to learn that Professor Bergson, who was announced to deliver the Essex Hall lecture in Whit-week, will be unable to do so owing to overwork. It is hoped, however, that the lecture is only postponed, and that he will be able to deliver it another year.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Special Notice to Correspondents.—Items of news for this column should be sent immediately after the event, and should reach the editor on Wednesday, except in the case of meetings held too late in the week to make this possible.

Belper.—The annual meeting of the Unitarian congregation was held on April 3, the minister, the Rev. A. Leslie Smith, B.A., presiding. Mr. William Jones, the secretary, gave a short review of the year's work. It is interesting to learn that the school has increased in the most encouraging way. In January, 1911, there were nineteen scholars, and in December fifty, including twenty-four young men. In September the Rev. A. Leslie Smith and Mr. William Wass, senior member of the minister's class, organised a football club for the school. It is in a local league, in which every player must regularly attend a Sunday school. Young men, mostly employed in mines and foundries, began to come into the minister's class. The football team, after some early defeats, has beaten the leading teams of the league, won the medals, and made the school famous in the district. The minister finds that he can interest the members of the class in higher things than sport, and a new opportunity has thus opened out for instruction and good influence.

Gateshead: The late Mr. John Pattinson.—Unity Church has suffered a great loss in the death, on March 28, of Mr. John Pattinson, of Shipcote House, Gateshead. Despite his 84 years, Mr. Pattinson was in good health up to quite recently, and was going about actively and happily till within a week of his death, which was brought about by a chill. Born at Alston, Mr. Pattinson belonged to a family well known in the chemical world, one of his relatives being Hugh Lee Pattinson, who invented a process for separating silver from lead. He adopted the profession of analytical chemist, and was public analyst for the large district that has Newcastle for its centre. He was ex-President of the London Chemical Society and of the Society of Public Analysts, as well as Vice-President of the Newcastle Chemical Society. A Liberal in politics, Mr. Pattinson was deeply interested in progressive measures for the uplifting of the people; he was also an ardent member of the Peace Society, and devoted to the cause of International Peace. He was a Justice of the Peace for Gateshead, a School Board Manager, and a Vice-President of the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Society. Mr. Pattinson was, however, perhaps best known by his enthusiasm for music and musical development in the North. He was President of the Gateshead and Newcastle Choral Union, and was held in high esteem by its members, many of whom attended the funeral and sang hymns at the graveside. He was a man of fine character and attractive personality, who discharged his civic functions with conscientious regularity, and held his opinions in a spirit of admirable charity. He was a generous supporter of the Unitarian movement in the North, a member and regular attender of Unity Church, and a large contributor to its funds. He was also identified with the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, having been its treasurer for several years, and since 1901 a vice-president. The funeral, which took place on Monday, April 1, at Jesmond Cemetery, Newcastle, was conducted by the Rev. William Wilson. There was a very large attendance, the municipalities of Newcastle and Gateshead being represented, and among those present were the Mayor of Gateshead, the Deputy Lord Mayor of Newcastle, Councillor R. H. Millican (representing the Sheriff of Newcastle), the Town Clerk, Alderman Sir J. Baxter Ellis, Alderman Sir Walter R. Plummer; Mrs. J. D. Wilson, Mrs. Baumgartner, Mrs. Valpy, Mr. and Mrs. Dakyns, Mrs. Moore Ede, Mr. Aneurin Williams, Dr. J. T. Dunn; Mr. Chas. Carter, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Coysh, Mr. J. Duncan Donald, Mrs. Wilson, Mr. G. Shyvers, Mr. F. Sutcliffe, Mr. R. N. Tait, of Gateshead Church; the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., Mr. S. Pescod, Mr. T. R. Short, Mr. W. H. Gellay, of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle; and Mr. H. Sutcliffe, Sunderland. The deepest sympathy is felt for Mrs. Pattinson and her daughters in their great bereavement.

Huddersfield.—On March 27–30 the annual sale of work was held at the Unitarian Church, £93 being realised. The opener was Councillor Blamires, the chairman being Mr. Whitworth, a former secretary. On the children's day the sale was opened by Miss Elsie Brooke (daughter of the chapel warden), who was supported by several of the scholars. Four of these recited appropriate lines composed by Mrs. Thackray. Fifteen new members have recently joined the church. The Guild has just concluded a most successful session by performing several scenes from Shakespeare, and a branch of the Women's League has also been formed.
